John McCain visits a place Friday he has absolutely no chance of winning: Canada. While McCain said he is traveling to Ottawa, Ontario, the nation's capital, to speak about free trade and other issues, this jaunt and prospective trips to the Middle East and Europe by Democrat Barack Obama are examples of how this year's presidential campaign has gone global, political analyst Stuart Rothenberg said.

A Canadian Welcome for McCain (NYT blog 6/19/08)
By Ian Austen
Like many people outside of the United States, Canadians have taken an unusually keen interest in this year's presidential election. The leak of a memo suggesting that Senator Barack Obama's campaign had privately assured Canadian diplomats not to regard his tough talk about Nafta too seriously, for example, became the subject of intense political debate in Parliament in March.

John and Cindy McCain would reap $373,429 if McCain's tax proposal were enacted (ThinkProgress 6/19/08)
In a new Center for American Progress Action Fund analysis, Michael Ettlinger documents how much the presidential candidates stand to personally benefit from the McCain and Obama tax proposals. The McCains — who report an annual income of over $6 million — would receive well over $300,000 from John McCain's tax plan. By contrast, both the Obamas and McCains would receive a substantial, albeit much smaller, savings under Obama's tax plan:

To Brian Deese,

I am informed that John Holdren is hosting a meeting on advanced nuclear technology in the WH on June 15. This meeting to hear from an industry group, "The Third Way" who are advocating an advanced nuclear technology and are seeking the DOE to fund an "advanced nuclear test center."

Here is what I told a friend (from the real world) about caution with this approach.

Best regard, John .

I believe this approach is deeply wrong. The greatest lesson from large scale new technology demonstration projects is to spend a lot of up front time analyzing the schedule, cost, and milestones of an integrated project development. In the case nuclear power history shows and common sense confirms that each technology option involves a project time line on the order of a decade, a cost on the order of $10 billion, and a very demanding up front regulatory process involving several years and a couple of billion dollars.

Clearly the private sector is not going to undertake such projects - especially given the low cost of natural gas. Equally clearly the federal government cannot afford to pay for even a small fraction of the interesting new reactor concepts that are around.

A nuclear innovation test center (at what cost) might cut the project development time and cost of each of the many competing fission/fusion alternatives. But, no estimate is offered of how much such a center might cost and how many projects would need to be pursued to justify it.

In sum, too little analysis of the prospects and costs of the advanced nuclear fusion alternatives and too little analysis of the leverage that might be realized from a advanced nuclear test center.

The federal resources available for energy RD&D are limited. Do you want to spend billions here or somewhere else. The U.S. certainly cannot afford to pursue "all the above."

Which Poses the Bigger Threat to U.S. National Security—Iran or Non-State Sunni Extremism?

Leading experts from Hudson Institute, the Brookings Institution, and the Center for American Progress weigh in.

With the belief that Iran's nuclear weapons program constituted the greatest threat to U.S. interests in the Middle East, Barack Obama entered the White House hoping to achieve a historic reconciliation with the Islamic Republic. However, the administration's current policies throughout the Middle East suggest that the White House no longer sees Iran as the key problem. Rather, it views the clerical regime as a potential partner, particularly when it comes to combating Sunni extremists like al Qaeda and ISIS. Following the defeat of the first insurgency in 2007-08, it took the remnants of that conflict years to recompose themselves. Then it also took a period of provocation on behalf of those groups determined to start a new war. But that alone was not enough; it took years of abuses and a handful of egregiously bad decisions at the highest political levels in Baghdad to give the insurgency the boost it needed to ensure it had take-off speed. Yet now, combined with a rejuvenated jihadist movement in the form of the ISIS, safe in its base in eastern Syria, it has "liberated" much of the country and brought the wages of years of bad governance to Baghdad.

The U.S. needs to find partners among its allies to develop and extend the technologies it will need to maintain its military edge in the air—especially if the Chinese and Russian plane designers are really catching up. Japan is an obvious choice for that partner. Its future fighters may not turn up on American radar screens—but its aerospace industry needs to be there, and soon.

Harold Furchtgott-Roth testifies on the role of the FCC and net neutrality, July 25, 2014

It is painful for me to read the Telecommunications Act of 1996 today.... The pain is not that the words are dated, even archaic. Some are; but most are not. The pain is more that vast sections of the Act have been hollowed out of any meaning by years of Commission rules and practice that have little if any foundation in statute. It is as if the decades of Congressional work that went into the passage of the Act were for naught because the FCC largely ignores the language anyway.

Document attached, 2016 highlights below:

Fox News' Fox and Friends: Only mentioned HRC twice from 7-8 AM this morning. The early segment focused on Giuliani and the anchors' disdain for POTUS's recent comments that he had restored America's image around the world, and the lack of aggressive policing in NYC. The first mention of HRC was that she had low turn-out at a fundraising event and was forced to invite more people to attend than she had originally intended. This was followed by more headlines, and a discussion about paid paternity leave. Neil Cavuto reported from Orlando on Gov. Rick Scott's economic growth forum, and what he expects both the Democratic and Republican positions will be about the state of the economy, and how robust it will continue to be, and mentioned HRC by name. Cavuto's comments were somewhat vague, but his reporting sounded fairly even-handed overall. The hour ended with headlines, and other pieces not relevant to HRC or politics generally.

CNN's New Day: HRC's poll numbers have been pushing towards the wrong direction. Numbers have been down significantly from March. There is a drop in favorable opinion of Hillary Clinton since June 2014. If 4 in 10 view her as trustworthy, could she be hurt? Yes, in the general election. Money must be spent to bring her credibility and trustworthiness back up after the email server controversy. Bernie Sanders pulling in at 15%. Bernie Sanders claims that he wants debates during the summer. He wants to get on people's radar.

MSNBC's Morning Joe: HRC's poll numbers have been plummeting since March. Her favorability rating has gone down 7% and honest and trustworthy have dropped to 8%. The polls show HRC is running about even with Paul, Rubio, Walker in the head to head match ups. HRC's problems are much more direct. She needs to figure out how she can answer questions in the press about the server, the uranium deals, India, etc. Argued she has said things like "flat broke" and people know that's not the case. She has had some major flubs that have done great damage to her brand. People say the main message of her campaign is income stagnation, bringing the middle class back, and she can't get that message out when all of the questions are about the foundation or emails. Mike Huckabee also gave an interview.

WH: U.S. Won't Recognize IL Sovereignty in Golan

Washington rejects Prime Minister Netanyahu's suggestion to U.S. President Obama at the White House on Monday to discuss the possibility of U.S. recognition of Israeli rule over the Golan Heights, a senior White House official said. In making the suggestion, Netanyahu pointed to Syria's growing destabilization from civil war. But the White House official said the U.S. position, which objects to Israel annexing the Golan Heights, remains unchanged, adding that Netanyahu's proposal was unjustified and could even harm U.S.-backed Syrian opposition forces. The administration official said Netanyahu raised the issue of the Golan Heights' status as part of a wider discussion with Obama about Israel's interests in Syria and his fears of growing Iranian control in the country.

Kerry: Two-state solution 'not impossible dream

John Kerry told an Israeli gathering at the United Nations on Wednesday that a two-state solution in the Middle East was "not an impossible dream" but would require courage. Kerry traveled to UN headquarters in New York to attend a commemoration of the 1975 speech delivered by Israeli ambassador Chaim Herzog denouncing a UN resolution that declared Zionism a form of racism. "The Zionist dream embraces the concept of Israel as a Jewish democracy, a beacon of light to all nations," Kerry told the event. "That dream can only be upheld by two states living side by side in security. "We all know from years of efforts: this is not an impossible dream. It is achievable."

Netanyahu Backpedals on Possibility of WB Pullout

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu on Wednesday walked backed a comment he made a day earlier suggesting that an Israeli unilateral pullout from the West Bank was possible under the right security conditions. "The prime minister didn't speak of a unilateral withdrawal but of the possibility of unilateral steps, specifically those that would strengthen Israel's security and diplomatic interests in the face of terror," Netanyahu's Likud party said in a Hebrew-language statement to the press, some 12 hours after Netanyahu made his remarks.

Report: Air Force Struck Near Damascus Airport

Israel's air force conducted strikes in the vicinity of the Damascus airport, claimed a number of media outlets linked to Syrian opposition groups on Wednesday. The source of the reports was unknown and they were not confirmed by any official bodies in Syria or Israel. The reports described pre-dawn loud explosions at the airport and rising pillars of smoke, while electricity went out completely. It was further reported that flights were temporarily halted for no known reason. The major Arab-language media outlets had not reported the purported incident as of publication. Neither had any official media outlets belonging to the Assad regime.

Hertzog Withholds Judgment on PM's U.S. Visit

Isaac Herzog, head of the political opposition in Israel, reserved judgment on Wednesday about Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's visit this week to Washington, saying the outcome was unclear despite what appeared to be an improved atmosphere created by the trip. "The proof of the pudding is in the eating," Mr. Herzog, leader of the Labor Party, told reporters at a meeting in New York organized by the Israel Policy Forum, a group that advocates a diplomatic solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. Mr. Herzog, whose own visit to the United States partly overlapped with Mr. Netanyahu's, said the success of the prime minister's meeting with President Obama and other administration officials would be determined partly by improvements in American military assistance to Israel and whether there was "any commitment on behalf of the prime minister to make a change on the peace front, on the Palestinian front, and this, I don't know."

London Mayor's WB Meetings Cancelled

Palestinians canceled a number of appointments with London Mayor Boris Johnson in protest over pro-Israel marks he has made during his visit to Israel, according to the British press. Social media has picked up and spread Johnson's verbal attacks on the Palestinian-led boycott, divestment and sanctions movement, leading to security concerns, the Guardian reported. Johnson called the movement "completely crazy." "Why would you – of all the countries in the region – why would you boycott the one which is actually a functioning democracy and a pluralist, open society and all the rest of it?" the mayor, on a three-day trade mission to Israel and the Palestinian territories, said to reporters during his visit, the alphr website reported. "I think the movement for a boycott is not very well supported. A few lefty academics probably."

Washington Post – November 12, 2015

In Meeting with Netanyahu, Obama has Foreign and Domestic Concerns

By Steven Mufson

President Obama met with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu this week with an eye on two fronts: the chaotic Middle East and the domestic political campaign, where Democrats are eager to make sure that support for Israel does not become a partisan issue in 2016.

Both categories of concern point toward a more pragmatic and realistic approach to U.S.-Israel relations for Obama that could reassure a key ally in an unstable region and soothe uneasy Democrats who backed the Iran nuclear deal. The new calibration would deprive Republicans who opposed the deal of political fodder they can use against Democrats.

"Most Democratic members of Congress are and will be relieved if tension between the president and prime minister is relaxed," said Robert Wexler, a former Democratic congressman from Florida who is now president of the S. Daniel Abraham Center for Middle East Peace. "There is no Democratic member of Congress who benefits from tension in the American-Israeli relationship."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Having won a victory with the deal limiting Iran's nuclear program — which Obama regards as a high point of his diplomatic record — the president can now shift the conversation away from Netanyahu's opposition to the deal and focus on enforcement of the accord. The two leaders vowed to hold Iran's feet to the fire, and Netanyahu refrained from denigrating the accord.

But with the region in disarray, Obama could also genuinely say he was receptive to Israel's request for more military aid. A detailed assessment of Israel's needs will be made — and completed in the midst of the campaign season.
And while Obama said he and Netanyahu explored what concrete steps Israel might be willing to take to ease tensions with the Palestinians, the president did so with limited expectations, thus bringing hope in line with reality.

"If you go to [diplomatic] war with the Israelis for no good reason when you know you can't achieve a breakthrough on a two-state solution, you risk giving Republicans enormous leverage in the election and put your former secretary of state in an awkward position of walking away from you," said Aaron Miller, vice president at the Wilson Center.

That former secretary of state — presidential hopeful Hillary Rodham Clinton — perhaps has more riding on the condition of the U.S.-Israel relationship than any other Democrat or Republican. Clinton's husband remains a popular figure in Israel, and she has, in general, taken a tough stance in defense of Israel's security. Still, congressional Democrats are concerned.

A Pew Research Center poll in March found that more Americans sympathize with Israel than with the Palestinians in their dispute; 65 percent sympathized with Israel and 46 percent with the Palestinians. Support for Israel was overwhelming among white evangelicals, 87 percent of whom said they sympathized with Israel.

Asked about their view of Netanyahu, Republicans said "favorable" by a margin of 47 percent to 16 percent; Democrats said "unfavorable" by 39 percent to 19 percent. Independents were almost evenly split, with 31 percent favorable and 28 unfavorable.

Senior administration officials said that U.S. politics were not the reason for tempered expectations during the Obama-Netanyahu meeting this week. One administration official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity to preserve relationships, said, "I don't think it's politics driving this. It's an assessment of where things are headed."

The official said, "Of course, there is another actor in all this: the Palestinians. Ultimately, this is not a conversation between us and the Israelis."But he added of Israel that "if they don't do something, the trends are not good ones. We don't want to see those occurring."

When it comes to fending off U.S. pressure to take steps in the West Bank to show continued support for a two-state solution, "clearly time is an ally for Bibi and an adversary for Obama," said Miller, who was involved in Arab-Israeli negotiations when he was a State Department official. "That has given rise to a certain sense of resignation in the administration." But he added that Secretary of State John F. Kerry was eager to make progress, hopeful that Israel will be open to ideas for progress. If the Israeli government considers "anything more than what Palestinians regard as gilding the cage, then Kerry will try to build on that to do whatever he can," Miller said.

Netanyahu met Kerry on Wednesday, and the State Department later issued a statement saying the two "had a constructive meeting" and "discussed concrete ideas for stopping the violence, improving conditions on the ground in the West Bank and Gaza, and moving the diplomatic process forward." What those ideas were remained unclear.

Even though Netanyahu billed his visit to Washington as a chance to mend fences, many analysts believe he failed to address fundamental issues straining the relationship.

At the Center for American Progress, David Makovsky, a fellow at the Washington Institute for Near East Politics, asked the Israeli leader what his "Plan B" was to preserve Israel as a majority Jewish, democratic state if Palestinian and Israeli leaders cannot agree on restarting peace talks. Netanyahu sidestepped the question; instead, he said that "unilateralism works less well than a negotiated solution." He said that leaving Gaza had only turned it into a "poison dagger" aimed at Israel, and he said Israel must be prepared for a long period of tension.

"I think that Prime Minister Netanyahu achieved one objective, which was to stop the bleeding in the relationship" with the United States, Wexler said. But he added that "the underlying tension and the primary question remain: Will Israel pursue policies that ensure that it remains a majority Jewish and democratic Zionist nation? That question, unfortunately, still remains unanswered. And so long as that question remains outstanding, there will be tension in the American-Israeli relationship no matter who the president is."

King Bibi Rules, but He's Weaker Than You Think

By Asher Schechter

It appears Benjamin Netanyahu and Barack Obama had a pretty good meeting in the White House this week.

Nothing meaningful was said (as expected), but the two leaders got to check their respective boxes. Netanyahu gave lip service to the idea of a two-state solution (an idea even the administration is reportedly despairing of). Netanyahu (probably) got the increase in military aid he was shooting for. Obama bought himself, and whoever ends up winning the Democratic presidential nomination, some peace and quiet by playing nice with Netanyahu.

In the videos and photos released from the meeting and its aftermath, Netanyahu appeared pleased, relaxed.

And really, why should Netanyahu be anything but pleased? His first meeting with Obama post-Iran-deal-squabble found Netanyahu more confident in his position than he has been in years, possibly ever. Since his decisive election victory in March Netanyahu has managed to solidify his rule, expand his already far-reaching influence on Israeli media, and quash all possible successors so thoroughly that even after his security and economic agendas blew up in his face in recent months, no credible opponent has sprung up.

True, Netanyahu's government hinges on a narrow majority, but the sort of internal rebellions that crippled his last government are far less likely. That's because Netanyahu himself now accounts for 25% of his own government. Netanyahu is Israel's prime minister, minister of foreign affairs, minister of economics, minister of regional cooperation and development, minister of communications, and chairman of Israel's security cabinet. (Until recently he was also the minister of health.)

That list of titles may sound like the character bio of a new king on HBO's Game of Thrones, but it's really just the list of the ministries occupied by one man, Netanyahu. The nickname "King Bibi" coined by Time in 2012, has never felt more accurate. In fact, Netanyahu's dominance of Israel seems so unshakable these days, that he might as well be upgraded to Emperor.

But Netanyahu's power can be misleading. He may lord over Israel, but his power is in fact predicated on him not doing much of anything. Sometimes even kings have to answer to somebody - and King Bibi answers to the status quo.
Hitler's mentor?

In recent years, as Israelis embraced the tenets of Netanyahu's worldview - his belief that Israel is locked in a mythical struggle that can never end, that ipso facto a "solution", peaceful or otherwise, is impossible – they also came to the conclusion that the strained, frenzied status quo is the best they can hope for. Therefore, they figure, it must be protected at all cost.

Netanyahu is the perfect person to defend it: after all, he is the one politician who has never claimed there is anything beyond the status quo.
And so Israel became, in effect, Bibi Nation, a country shaped by the pessimism of its leader. As this pessimism entrenched itself, Netanyahu's clout grew more and more powerful. Recently, he seems to have begun adopting the mannerisms of an imperial ruler. Or, at least, an Eastern European one.

For instance, he now allows himself to say things no one else would dare say. Any other prime minister would have likely been crucified for saying that Hitler needed the guidance of a Palestinian cleric to kill Jews, or be branded a nebbish defeatist for uttering something as utterly hopeless as Netanyahu's recent claim that "Israel will always live by the sword".

Also, Netanyahu (whose numerous expenditure scandals and infamous penchant for hedonism has been long parodied by Israel's satirists, bought himself a new plane. And a castle. Israel's security cabinet has recently approved the purchase of a new jet for the prime minister (and the president), along with a plan to build a new office and residence for the prime minister in Jerusalem. The cost: 1 billion shekels ($250 million).

He also has very little patience these days for rules or protocols. Netanyahu has steamrolled his way into approving the government's patently bad deal with Israel's natural gas monopoly in a manner so brutal it makes his crusade against the Iran deal shenanigans look like a trip to the grocery store.

Then there are the fawning public tributes. For example, this frighteningly Ceausescu-esque birthday video made for Sara Netanyahu by Eastern European orphans. Or this Gaddafi-esque birthday video made for Benjamin Netanyahu, starring some of Israel's top celebs and public figures.

But there's a condition to Netanyahu's great power, and it is that when it comes to the Palestinian issue, he must rule from a gilded cage of inaction. Bibism, the worldview he instilled into the people of Israel, is by now bigger than him personally. Israelis may idolize Bibi, but they worship at the church of the status quo.

The status-quo zealot?

Outside observers may wonder why Netanyahu doesn't use his immense power to pursue radical policies. Despite a seemingly clear mandate to pursue his policies, Netanyahu has in fact done very little since entering his new term, or indeed his first one.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Even with the West Bank on the verge of a popular uprising, Netanyahu has remained quite passive. He has avoided drastic measures on Temple Mount, in the settlements or in regards to the Palestinians.

In fact, contrary to his image as a right-wing zealot, Netanyahu has always chosen the status quo over his stated ideology. Unlike Israeli leaders such as Arik Sharon or Yitzhak Rabin, Netanyahu has never revealed any game-changing initiative. He has always preferred occasional short Gaza skirmishes to comprehensive plans.

Just look at his recent behavior: in March Netanyahu renounced his commitment to the two-state solution. This week he told Obama he "has not given up on a two-state solution". (He has zigzagged on this many times over the years).

Acting ideologically has never rewarded Netanyahu. It took him years to reclaim the popularity he lost following the drastic budget cuts he made as finance minister in Ariel Sharon's second government. During his first term as prime minister, he opened up the Western Wall Tunnel, sparking massive riots that haunted him years later. His actions on the gas issue, the only issue he acted on during his current term, led to the biggest anti-government protests in years.

Netanyahu has learned a long time ago that the key to survival in Israeli politics is to not implement your ideology - or anyone else's, for that matter. This is why he is Israel's most stable leader, because he has long figured out the secret key to Israelis' psyche: when push comes to shove, Israelis will always prefer the reality they know, no matter how dim, over a change that might turn out to be hopeful. Israelis in general distrust hopeful changes. All they want is to continue the lives they know undisturbed.

Netanyahu's paradox is that he is Israel's most powerful leader, and also its weakest. His power is protected by the implicit promise that he will change nothing. He may be the closest thing Israel has to an emperor, but he is a rather powerless one, in the end. He may be adorned with spoils and kinglike adoration, but in fact, he is simply the steward of the status quo. A "king" only by nickname. More Elizabeth II than Louis XIV.

Subject: Oil Prices

This is one of the better pieces I have seen on oil prices. It is significantly more open to the role of speculation in oil pricing than I would have expected. (It is ironic that Barron's is accusing speculators while Krugman is defending them) It also emphasizes the role of the weak dollar and Federal Reserve Policy.

From this week's BARRON'S

Bye, Bubble?
The Price of Oil May Be Peaking

By ANDREW BARY

The price of oil may be peaking in the current range of $130 to $140 a barrel. Here's where you want to be when the bubble bursts. (Video)

Top of Form

Bottom of Form

IT'S PERILOUS TO CALL THE TOP IN A BOOMING MARKET, but the price of oil may be peaking in the current range of $130 to $140 a barrel.

Oil's sharp move up -- prices have doubled in the past year -- caught the world by surprise, including almost everyone involved in the petroleum market, from major exporting nations to big energy companies to the global analyst community. The rally has emboldened oil bulls, who argue the world is bumping up against oil-supply constraints, and that demand will rise inexorably, despite sharply higher prices, as the four billion to five billion people in emerging economies like China and India get a taste of the energy-intensive good life, replete with the cars, air conditioners, refrigerators and computers that Americans and Western Europeans have long enjoyed. Statistics support their view that demand growth is in its infancy in the developing world: U.S. per-capita oil consumption is 25 barrels annually, while Japan uses 14 barrels per person. China's 1.3 billion people consume just two barrels each per year, however, and India's 1.1 billion use less than a barrel a year.

In the next decade, oil indeed may hit $200 a barrel. But prices could fall to $100 a barrel by the end of this year if Saudi Arabia makes good on its pledge to increase production; global demand eases; the Federal Reserve begins lifting short-term interest rates; the dollar rallies, and investors stop pouring money into the oil market. China raised prices on retail gasoline and diesel fuel by 18% Thursday, in a move that is expected to curb demand.

It's tough to know how much of the surge in crude-oil prices -- up 40% just this year -- reflects fundamental supply and demand, and how much is due to other factors, including the dollar, commodity speculation and interest from institutional investors. Like some others, we suspect the run-up was fueled by more than economics.

THERE IS GROWING TALK OF AN OIL BUBBLE, THOUGH evidence of asset bubbles isn't conclusive until they burst. The trajectory of oil prices in the past eight years looks eerily similar to the Nasdaq's eight-year run to a peak of more than 5,000 in March 2000. More than eight years later, the Nasdaq is at half that level.

"My basic message to those who say that prices have to go up forever is that the oil markets have been cyclical for 140 years. Why should that have stopped?" says Edward Morse, chief energy economist at Lehman Brothers.

Saudi Arabia, the world's biggest oil exporter, has pledged to boost production from a recent 9.5 million barrels a day to about 9.7 million in order to reduce prices. The Saudis are hosting a summit of oil producers and consumers on June 22.

"The analytic community is divided on what the recent Saudi comments mean for the market," says Morse, who believes the Saudis will put more oil on the market as they raise production. "That, combined with a declining rate of consumption, should create an inventory surplus that will be palpable as the year progresses."

Morse thinks oil could fall to $100 by year end.
Skeptics say the Saudi vow to boost production is merely talk, and that the country is struggling simply to maintain production because of aging, overworked fields like the huge, 60-year-old Ghawar reservoir. The Saudi government refuses to allow in outsiders to evaluate the state of its oil industry, which has fueled talk the Saudis are hiding something.

Likewise, the size of speculative positions and commodity indexers is impossible to determine, as most trading occurs away from the major commodity exchanges in over-the-counter transactions.

It is hard to argue that oil demand supports $135 crude. Now at 86 million barrels a day, global demand could show little or no increase this year after averaging 1% gains in recent years. Sanford Bernstein analyst Neil McMahon projects that by the fourth quarter, global oil demand could be running below the fourth quarter of 2007.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Consumption is down in '08 in the 30 member nations of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD), which includes the U.S., Western Europe, Japan and Australia. OECD nations account for 57% of global oil demand.

While Americans are married to their cars, $4-a-gallon gasoline has begun to bite; the number of vehicle miles traveled in the U.S fell in March on a year-over-year basis for the first time since 1979. Further declines in gasoline consumption may follow as drivers opt for more fuel-efficient cars, and as innovations like plug-in cars reach the market after 2010. Major U.S. airlines have announced widespread capacity reductions, which could cut demand for jet fuel by 5% or more later this year.

Oil demand continues to grow in the developing world and the Middle East. In Europe, stiff energy taxes generally blunt the impact of higher prices, but diesel fuel, now at nearly $10 a gallon in Britain (double the American price), may be at an unsupportable level. Demand growth could cool in emerging markets, too, as subsidies in many Asian countries are reduced. There is also speculation China has been hoarding diesel fuel ahead of the Olympics in August, in order to cut the use of coal for power generation around Beijing in the hope of cleaning up the city's notoriously polluted air. Once the games are over, China will go back to burning cheaper coal, the story goes.

The supply/demand argument for higher oil prices has some merit. "Name another commodity that has gone up two-and-a-half times in three-and-a-half years and the world hasn't found a way to make more of it," says Byron Wien, chief investment strategist at Pequot Capital Management. "The world isn't finding oil fast enough to replace the 3% to 4% that gets pumped every year."

Wien's boss, Art Samberg, who heads the Westport, Conn.-based investment firm, stated in Barron's midyear Roundtable, published last week , that the commodity bubble "isn't going to burst. It's going to continue to expand." Older oil fields in Mexico and the North Sea are running dry while new sources in places like Kazakhstan and Brazil may prove difficult to bring on stream. In addition, oil increasingly is in the hands of government-run monopolies that may be more interested in maximizing future revenue than boosting current production.

The dollar's slide and the Federal Reserve's neglect of the greenback have supported commodity prices, oil in particular. But Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke and his colleagues finally seem to have realized that the Fed's aggressive easing actions since last summer, which dropped the key federal-funds rate to 2% from 5.25%, may be fueling global inflation. If the Fed moves to lift rates later this year, as financial markets anticipate, it could buttress the dollar and spur an exodus of speculators from the oil market.

One little-discussed way the U.S. could try to bring down oil prices is to sell oil from the strategic petroleum reserve (SPR). The SPR, intended as a source of oil for national emergencies, now holds 705 million barrels of crude, equal to about 35 days of domestic consumption. With prices higher, Congress moved in May to stop adding to the SPR as it neared capacity. A sale of 100 million barrels of oil would shock the markets and potentially drive down prices.

Long term, the U.S. could benefit through lower oil prices if Congress and the states back President Bush's proposal to allow drilling off Florida, the East and West coasts, and in the Alaskan National Wildlife Reserve, where billions of barrels of oil may lie.

A SHARP DROP IN ENERGY PRICES WOULD HELP WHOLE swaths of the U.S. economy, including retailers, food and household-goods makers, auto makers and transportation concerns. Beleaguered U.S. airlines would benefit because they're expected to spend $61 billion on fuel this year, up $20 billion from 2007.

Few oil stocks would be safe if crude falls $20 to $30 a barrel. Independent exploration and production companies like Devon Energy (DVN), Apache (APA) and XTO Energy (XTO) could get hit hard because they're up sharply in the past year. The majors, including ExxonMobil (XOM), Chevron (CVX) and ConocoPhillips (COP), might hold up better because they have refining and related businesses like chemicals, whose profitability isn't directly linked to crude and natural-gas prices.

Some of the biggest oil companies, notably ExxonMobil, Royal Dutch Shell (RDS/A) and BP (BP), have badly lagged in the past year. BP, for one, has been beset by problems, including a troubled joint venture in Russia.

The majors may be the best energy values because they trade for less than 10 times this year's earnings and around eight times estimated 2009 profits. The '09 earnings consensus reflects an assumption of $100 crude, not the current $135. Bernstein's McMahon estimates Exxon could earn $12 share in 2009, versus the current consensus of $9, if oil holds $130 and natural gas averages $11 per thousand cubic feet; it is now around $13. This suggests Exxon, at 86, may be trading for just seven times estimated '09 profits. Conoco and Chevron also could earn far more than the current '09 consensus under the same oil and gas scenario, Bernstein estimates. McMahon favors BP, Royal Dutch and Marathon Oil (MRO).

One reason for the strength in crude has been modest U.S. inventories. Bill Klesse, chief executive of Valero Energy (VLO), the largest North American oil refiner, told analysts last month that the inventory data may be misinterpreted as a sign of oil scarcity, though it is more a function of the recent state of the oil market, in which futures prices were below spot prices, giving refiners little incentive to maintain excess supply. If the Saudis sell enough oil to drive down spot prices relative to futures prices, refiners and others will be induced to buy and hold more oil in inventory, he said. The oil market is moving to such a configuration, with the current, or spot price of $135 below the December 2008 price of $136.

OIL-MARKET EXPERTS ACKNOWLEDGE THAT commodity-indexing strategies employed by endowments, pension funds and other institutional investors have helped push up prices in the past year. Such investments are thought to have totaled $260 billion as of March, up from $13 billion at the end of 2003, according to Michael Masters, the head of Masters Capital Management, an Atlanta investment firm. Some $55 billion may have flowed into commodity investments during the first quarter alone. The energy complex is the largest commodity market, and gets a disproportionate share of fund flows.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Masters estimates index participants may control over 1 billion barrels of crude.

Managers of leading university endowments, including those at Harvard, Yale and Princeton, in recent years have generated outsized returns from investments in hard assets, prompting other investors, such as the giant California Public Employees Retirement System, with over $200 billion in assets, to attempt the same. Calpers is upping its commodity exposure to $7 billion from under $500 million.

This activity is spurring a backlash in Congress, where pension funds and others have been accused of driving up food and energy costs through their increased commodity investments. Lawmakers including Senator Joe Lieberman (independent, Conn.) have proposed a ban on commodity-related investments by pension funds, which Masters supports. Last month he told Congress that commodity regulators need to close a loophole that lets indexers evade commodity-position limits by purchasing over-the-counter swaps and other derivatives.

A selloff in oil and other commodities could cool the ardor for index strategies. Ross Margolies, head of Stelliam Investment Management, in New York, says financial investors would do better buying the shares of commodities producers, not actual goods. Over time, it may be more difficult to make money in commodity investing because holders effectively incur financial costs to carry and store commodities, even if they never take physical delivery.

Though little noticed, short-covering by independent oil and gas producers might have contributed to the recent strength in oil and gas prices. U.S. exploration and production companies like Devon, XTO and Chesapeake Energy (CHK) have hedged an average of about 40% of their 2008 production by selling oil and gas futures, options or derivatives, according to Credit Suisse analyst Jonathan Wolff. As prices have surged, the hedges have slipped underwater, and some producers have sought to unwind their money-losing bets.

Newfield Exploration (NFX) recently announced a $500 million hedge-related loss, and more red ink could follow. Total hedge losses among E&P companies could top $15 billion for 2008, and $8 billion for 2009, Wolff estimates.

While supply challenges could continue to dog the oil market, current prices seem excessive in light of weakening demand and other factors. But it's impossible to know with precision when the bubble will burst. The Saudis could roil the markets with a pronouncement June 22; the dollar could revive or demand could plummet, or all three. And if prices start falling, the downturn could accelerate, sending crude back to $100 -- where it would be cheaper, but still far from cheap.

MSNBC: "Is this Hillary Clinton's campaign slogan?"

By Alex Seitz-Wald

August 10, 2014, 8:46 p.m. EDT

In a wide-ranging interview where she put some rare distance between herself and President Obama, former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton hinted at a potential presidential run and laid out a message that sounds a lot like a campaign slogan.

Asked by the The Atlantic magazine's Jeffrey Goldberg for her "organizing principle," she replied with an tidy alliterative three-word phrase: "Peace, progress, and prosperity."

If it sounds like a presidential campaign slogan, that's because it is – or at least was in 1956, when Dwight Eisenhower ran for reelection on the promise of "Peace, prosperity, and progress."

It's a message that was also used by the White House of her husband, Bill Clinton, to sum up his accomplishments. And a variation – "prosperity and progress" – became Al Gore's 2000 presidential campaign slogan.

The phrase has resonance in Clinton's personal history as well. During her famous "glass ceiling" speech conceding the Democratic nomination to Barack Obama in 2008, Clinton said she got into the race to put "our country back on the path to peace, prosperity and progress." As secretary of state, she said America's global leadership was essential to creating "a more peaceful, prosperous, progressive world."

Clinton, has said she won't decide on a presidential run until at least the end of the year, but told Goldberg that she's about "to find out, in more ways than one" if the public agrees with her vision.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Peace, progress, and prosperity” strikes a different tone from her 2008 messages, when she was criticized for shifting between numerous slogans that lacked emotional resonance. Some were about Clinton’s resume – “Ready for Change, Ready to Lead,” for instance – more than her version. While the prescriptive slogans, like “Solutions for America,” could feel somewhat technocratic.

“Peace, progress, and prosperity” could emphasize her biggest strength (her foreign policy experience), while also giving a nod to restive progressives and a hint at a vaguely populist economic agenda.

“You’ve got to take care of your home first,” Clinton explained to Goldberg about how her vision of “prosperity” circumscribes an expansionist foreign policy. “If we don’t restore the American dream for Americans, then you can forget about any kind of continuing leadership in the world.”

Meanwhile, Clinton broke with the president on foreign policy in a meaningful way. She’s been extremely careful to put almost no daylight between herself and Obama since conceding the 2008 race and joining his administration.

But in the interview, she seemed to criticize Obama’s cautious and circumstance-based foreign policy approach, saying, “Great nations need organizing principles, and ‘Don’t do stupid stuff’ is not an organizing principle.”

Clinton also said the “failure” to arm more moderate rebels in Syria – something she and other administration officials wanted to before being overruled by Obama – helped lead to the rise of the Islamic State, the jihadi group that has taken over large swaths of Syria and Iraq.

Clinton has always been more hawkish than Obama, but kept whatever disagreements she had with the president mostly out of sight until now. If she decides to run, she will almost certainly have to cleave herself from the White House, both to keep the unpopular Obama at some distance and because of their genuinely different policy views in some areas.

Wall Street Journal opinion: Review & Outlook: “Democrats on the Obama Doctrine”

[No Writer Mentioned]

August 10, 2014, 6:38 p.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] The President's erstwhile employees admit the world is a mess.

The latest reviews of Barack Obama's foreign policy are in, and flattering they are not. "Just leaves you scratching your head," says one, about the President's rationale for providing limited support to the Kurds in Iraq. "Nothing we can point to that's been very successful," says another about the President's policy in Syria.

And then there's this zinger: "Great nations need organizing principles, and 'Don't do stupid stuff' is not an organizing principle."

In case you are wondering which trio of neoconservative naysayers we're quoting here, we refer you, respectively, to James Steinberg, formerly the President's Deputy Secretary of State, and Robert Ford, formerly his Ambassador to Syria, and Hillary Rodham Clinton, formerly his loyal Secretary of State.

Mrs. Clinton's remark is especially notable given the hints she's dropping about her 2016 plans. She made them in an interview in the Atlantic, in which she also staked out hawkish positions on nuclear negotiations with Iran and Syria's Bashar Assad. At this rate, she may be re-advocating Saddam Hussein's ouster by the time primary season approaches.

This all could be—perish the thought—political opportunism on the part of those who have now found the flaws in the foreign policy they once helped execute. Then again, if opportunism causes liberals to acknowledge the failures of Mr. Obama's worldview, we'll take it. Better that than a dogmatist in the White House sticking to his case for America's retreat.

Reuters: "Hillary Clinton distances herself from Obama's foreign policy"

By Will Dunham

August 10, 2014, 3:44 p.m. EDT

Distancing herself from President Barack Obama's foreign policy, potential 2016 U.S. presidential candidate Hillary Clinton said in an interview published on Sunday that the U.S. decision not to intervene early in the Syrian civil war was a "failure."

Republican critics and others have faulted Obama for doing too little to support Syrians who rose up against President Bashar al-Assad. Syria has been torn apart by a civil war for three years, with Assad staying in power and Islamic militants among the opposition gaining strength.

"The failure to help build up a credible fighting force of the people who were the originators of the protests against Assad - there were Islamists, there were secularists, there was everything in the middle - the failure to do that left a big vacuum, which the jihadists have now filled," Clinton said in an interview with The Atlantic.

Clinton was Obama's secretary of state during his first term as president, stepping down in early 2013, so she was part of the administration during the start of the Syria uprising. Seen as a possible strong contender for the 2016 U.S. Democratic presidential nomination, she ran unsuccessfully against Obama for the party's nomination in 2008.

Asked about Obama's slogan of "Don't do stupid stuff" to describe his foreign policy thinking, Clinton said, "Great nations need organizing principles, and 'Don't do stupid stuff' is not an organizing principle."

In the interview, Clinton also offered strong support for Israel and for Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, who has a tense relationship with Obama.

Israel has drawn international condemnation for the deaths of Palestinian non-combatants in Gaza and the destruction of thousands of homes during its month of war with the Islamist movement Hamas. The Obama administration, while supporting Israel's right to defend itself, has rebuked Israel at least once during the current conflict over the deaths of civilians.

"I think Israel did what it had to do to respond to the (Hamas) rockets. Israel has a right to defend itself. The steps Hamas has taken to embed rockets and command and control facilities and tunnel entrances in civilian areas, this makes a response by Israel difficult," Clinton said.

Questioned about whether Israel has taken enough steps to prevent the deaths of civilians including children, Clinton said the United States also tries to be careful to avoid civilian casualties in war but sometimes mistakes are made.

"We've made them. I don't know a nation, no matter what its values are - and I think that democratic nations have demonstrably better values in a conflict position - that hasn't made errors, but ultimately the responsibility rests with Hamas," Clinton added.

The Telegraph (U.K.): "Hillary Clinton attacks Barack Obama over foreign policy"

By David Millward

August 10, 2014, 10:18 p.m. BST

President Barack Obama's foreign policy has come under attack from Hillary Clinton, his former Secretary of State and possible successor in the White House.

Mrs Clinton has rounded on his caution in providing aid for opponents of the dictatorial Syrian regime of Bashar al-Assad.

She used an interview in The Atlantic to put distance between herself and Mr Obama, even though she was part of his first administration.

Some critics have argued that the failure to take decisive action in the early stages of the Syrian civil war strengthened the hand of hardline jihadist groups who, it is feared, could eventually pose a terrorist threat in the United States itself.

"The failure to help build up a credible fighting force of the people who were the originators of the protests against Assad – there were Islamists, there were secularists, there was everything in the middle – the failure to do that left a big vacuum, which the jihadists have now filled," she said.

Mrs Clinton was particularly withering about Mr Obama's slogan of "don't do stupid stuff" – which the President said was the guiding principle to his approach to foreign policy.

"Great nations need organising principles, and 'Don't do stupid stuff' is not an organising principle," she added.

Mrs Clinton also was noticeably warmer in her support for Israel than Mr Obama, whose relationship with Benjamin Netanyahu, the Israeli Prime Minister, has been strained.

She defended Israel's response to the attacks on its territory by Hamas, despite global criticism of the civilian death toll in Gaza.

"Israel has a right to defend itself. The steps Hamas has taken to embed rockets and command and control facilities and tunnel entrances in civilian areas, this makes a response by Israel difficult.

"Asked about civilian casualties she said mistakes can be made by democratic countries, including the United States

"We've made them. I don't know a nation, no matter what its values are – and I think that democratic nations have demonstrably better values in a conflict position – that hasn't made errors, but ultimately the responsibility rests with Hamas."

Bill Clinton emphasized his family's ability to get things done at a fund-raiser to kick off his and Hillary's Hamptons vacation.

While Saturday's fund-raiser, at the Water Mill home of jewelry designer Joan Hornig and her investment banker husband, George, was for the Clinton Foundation and no mention of Hillary's political aspirations was made, some wondered when Bill described the foundation as "the 'How Organization' — we get things done."

Chairs of the event, who made a $50,000 donation per couple, included Richard and Lisa Perry, Michael Kempner and wife Jacqueline, Susan and Alan Patricof, co-chair Jay Eisenhofer while other guests included Jean Shafiroff and Harvey Weinstein.

Politico: "NYC's all-star convention roster"

By Maggie Haberman

August 11, 2014, 5:34 a.m. EDT

New York City has put together a sweeping list of more than 30 people — ranging from Napster founder Sean Parker to Goldman Sachs chairman Lloyd Blankfein to designer Diane von Furstenberg to union leaders — committed to raising the money to host the Democratic National Convention in Brooklyn in 2016.

The list of who's sitting on the host committee was obtained by POLITICO as members of the Democratic National Committee head to New York City for a site visit Monday and Tuesday.

New York City Mayor Bill de Blasio is pushing to host the convention in his home borough. There are a range of choices facing the DNC in terms of host cities, but several Democratic insiders have told POLITICO that Brooklyn and Philadelphia are viewed as the frontrunners.

Of the members of the host committee, one of the most surprising names is Parker — who has made moves to become a political force this cycle and who has ties to Deputy Mayor Peter Ragone.

There are entertainment industry figures, like Cynthia Nixon, Russell Simmons and Richard Plepler, the head of HBO. There are donors with long ties to Bill and Hillary Clinton, like Alan Patricof and Ron Perelman, but also those now known primarily from the Barack Obama orbit, like financiers Robert Wolf, Marc Gallogly, Blair Effron and public-relations executive Michael Kempner.

There are other Wall Street titans, like JP Morgan Chase's Jamie Dimon and American Express's Kenneth Chenault, real estate leaders like Douglas Durst and Marc Holliday and business figures like Partnership for a Greater New York City president Kathy Wylde.

There are union leaders like Retail, Wholesale and Department Store Union president Stuart Appelbaum and 32BJ president Hector Figueroa. There are communications executives like Verizon senior vice president Leecia Eve and AT&T executive Marissa Shorenstein.

The goal of the list is to demonstrate a broad cross-section of people committed to the event, as well as an ability to fully fund a convention, which is an enormously expensive undertaking no matter where it's held. But in a major city like New York City, the costs can rise.

In 2004, when the city played host to the Republican National Convention, the host committee raised $84 million.

Associated Press: "Philly History May Hold Democratic Convention Edge"

By Hope Yen

August 11, 2014, 1:49 a.m. EDT

One of five cities bidding for the Democratic National Convention, Philadelphia appears to hold an early edge with a track record of hosting the major gathering - not to mention that Hillary Rodham Clinton and Vice President Joe Biden have family ties to the state.

The original U.S. capital and now the nation's fifth largest city, Philadelphia touts its historical significance. It has hosted the presidential nominating convention seven times since 1856, most recently the Republican one in 2000.

Also vying for the 2016 convention are Birmingham, Alabama; New York City's Brooklyn borough; Columbus, Ohio; and Phoenix - each hoping to host its first presidential convention.

"I do think that Philadelphia has a very good chance of getting it," said former DNC Chairman Joe Andrew, who guided the party's selection of convention cities from 1996 to 2004 and supports the city's bid. He noted that Philadelphia was a front-runner for the 2000 Democratic convention, but Republicans picked it first.

"Philadelphia has a strong bid based on great mechanics, and there's no question that Democrats would like to nail down Pennsylvania," Andrew said. He said Clinton's and Biden's family ties to Pennsylvania will likely be "a consideration."

Former DNC Chairman Howard Dean, who presided over Democrats' choice of Denver in 2008, also rated the city as a top contender. "Philadelphia would be a successful host," he said.

DNC members will be in the City of Brotherly Love for two days starting Wednesday to review potential venues, hotels and transportation options for the estimated 50,000 delegates, party activists and media expected for the convention. Visits to the other cities are to be completed by mid-September.

The Obama White House also will weigh in on the final selection, with a decision not expected until later this year or early in 2015.

A perennial swing state with 20 electoral votes, Pennsylvania more recently has trended liberal, due in part to Hispanic immigration and other population growth in Philadelphia and its suburbs that have balanced out GOP-leaning voters elsewhere. Democratic presidential candidates have carried the state since 1992.

"We're very hopeful about our chances," said former DNC chairman Ed Rendell, a former Pennsylvania governor and Philadelphia mayor who is helping guide the 2016 bid.

The city's media market covers large parts of New Jersey, a potential factor if New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, a Republican, runs for president. Democrat Hillary Clinton's father was born in Scranton, and daughter Chelsea's mother-in-law, Marjorie Margolies, lives in the Philadelphia suburbs.

Biden grew up in Scranton and often touts his middle-class Pennsylvania roots.

DNC officials have stressed that a city must meet logistical requirements - fundraising, ample hotel rooms and local transportation- before political factors such as swing-state status, a city's diversity and strong labor relationships are considered.

"We are focused right now on the technical aspects," said DNC spokeswoman Lily Adams.

Philadelphia boosters are emphasizing their convention experience and space with the Wells Fargo Center and the recently expanded Philadelphia Convention Center. Officials say they'll be able to handle the $55 million to $60 million price tag and provide ample security.

The national convention is a major boon to the host city, bringing national media attention and up to $200 million for the local economy.

The city that is home to cheesesteaks, the Liberty Bell, Benjamin Franklin and the movie hero Rocky is promising a "walkable experience" of culture, downtown hotels, food and history, compared to two contenders that it considers as its main rivals, Brooklyn and Columbus.

Brooklyn offers itself as a hip, national symbol of New York Mayor Bill de Blasio's liberalism. It has strong fundraising ability and is in a state Clinton represented as U.S. senator. But it has just 3,500 hotel rooms in the borough - convention officials are seeking 17,000 within a close drive - meaning many attendees would need to stay in other boroughs such as Manhattan, potentially straining public transit.

Columbus promotes itself as a fast-growing swing city in the hard-fought battleground of Ohio. After the Republican National Committee selected Cleveland to host its convention, the mayor cautioned that Democrats risked losing Ohio in 2016 if they didn't pick Columbus.

Columbus's bid has at times stirred the competitive instincts of Pennsylvania boosters.

After initially criticizing Columbus and its bid, U.S. Rep. Bob Brady, D-Pa., has more recently focused on Philadelphia's strengths.

"Philadelphia has much more to offer," Brady said.

Re: Topline Results

Horse-race

The last survey was conducted in February. Now that the race has become more engaged, the ballot in New Hamphsire has tightened considerably, but Secretary Clinton maintains a double digit lead over Sanders (48% support for Secretary Clinton, 34% for Bernie Sanders, 2% for Martin O'Malley, 1% for Lincoln Chafee, 2% "other" and 13% undecided).

Ballot Tracking

	Feb 2015	June 2015	Δ
Difference (HRC-Sanders)	+61	+14	-47
Hillary Clinton	73	48	-25
Bernie Sanders	12	34	+22

Jim Webb	3
Other	2	2	n/c
Don't Know	9	13	+4

Note: In February Jim Webb was asked. In June, Lincoln Chafee was asked.*

When undecided voters are pushed to make a choice, Clinton's lead breaks the 50% threshold while Sanders' vote share sees little movement (53% Clinton and 36% Sanders).

Sanders has raised his name identification and favorables considerably since we last polled. His name ID has increased from 52% to 77% and his favorability increased from 44% to 70%. Secretary Clinton's overal favorabilitiy is 85% with 12% unfavorable. Currently Sanders' very favorable is 46% while that for Secretary Clinton's is 39%.

The Sanders vote does not appear to be an anti-Clinton vote. Clinton is the second choice of most Sanders voters. Almost seven in ten (66%) of Sanders voters say Secretary Clinton is their second choice preference.

As of now, only about three in ten voters are familiar enough to have an opinion of Martin O'Malley or Lincoln Chafee, respectively.

As shown in the ballot progression below, after voters hear a positive profile of both Sanders and O'Malley, Sanders gains 3% and O'Malley gains 4% support. Once voters subsequently heard a positive profile of Secretary Clinton the ballot reverts to close to initial ballot support. Providing voters negative information about both Clinton and Sanders did not significantly change ballot support. In fact, the final ballot (which comes after negative information about both Clinton and Sanders) is almost identical to the initial ballot – a 13% HRC advantage, compared with an initial 14% advantage.

I know it's a long way off, but if the Democratic primary for President were held today, would you vote for…?

The Candidates

When asked what words they associate with Clinton, the responses were generally positive and describe Clinton as strong, intelligent and capable. They described Sanders as honest/trustworthy, a liberal/progressive and other generally positive characteristics.

However, when asked about recent coverage of Clinton, we see that the negative coverage has cut through. When asked what they've recently heard, most voters report hearing about the email scandal (32%), contributions to the Clinton Foundation (14%) or stories surronding Benghazi (10%).

When presented with a series of attributes and asked how well it applies to Clinton, voters were most likely to ascribe strength, ability to make tough choices and fights for people like you to Clinton. Clinton performed the worst on holding Wall Street accountable, being in touch with the lives of ordinary Americans and being genuine.

Half of all likely voters (51%) describe Clinton as moderate whereas close to half (46%) describe Sanders as very liberal. Notably, most primary voters describe themslves as liberal (50%) and only 38% describe themselves as moderate.

Message/Policy

While a majority of likely voters (50%) do not hold a position on TPP, among those who do the intensity of opposition is higher than the intensity of support (10% strongly support vs. 19% strongly oppose).

Meanwhile, a majority of voters prefer Clinton's approach to the banking industry of holding top executives accountable compared to Sanders' approach of breaking up the banks (regardless of whether we reference the recovering economy or not). It should be noted that neither candidate's name was associated with the position tested and that Clinton's weakest attribute is her abiilty to hold Wall Street accountable.

After voters hear a positive profile on both Sanders and O'Malley, Clinton's lead dops to a seven point margin (44% Clinton, 37% Sanders, 7% O'Malley, 1% Chafee, 2% other and 9% don't know). However, once voters hear a positive profile on Clinton she re-gains her double-digit lead (+12 points).

- On a topline basis the two paragraphs about Hillary Clinton tested, one focusing on values and the other policy, are comparable. Further analysis will be needed to see if they perform differently among sub-groups.

Secretary Clinton's top vulnerability tested in this poll is the attack that claims as Secretary of State she signed off on a deal that gave the Russian government control over twenty percent of America's uranium production, after investors in the deal donated over one hundred and forty million dollars to the Clinton Foundation. Half of all likely voters (53%) are less likely to support Clinton after hearing that statement and 17% are much less likely to support her after that statement.

After voters heard a battery of negatives on Secretary Clinton, their top concern was that she does not seem honest (16%).

Sanders' chief vulnerability tested is his record on guns. Almost a quarter of all voters (23%) are much less likely and more than six in ten (63%) are less likely to support Sanders after hearing that the NRA helped Sanders win a seat in Congress, that he opposed the Brady Gun Bill, supports allowing guns on passenger trains and supported a bill designed to protect gun manufacturers from lawsuits filed by families of victims of gun crimes like the Sandy Hook parents. As we heard in the recent focus groups, the issue of gun control is particularly salient given the recent shootings in Charleston, South Carolina.

From David Sirota:

Karen:

Hey there - hope you are well. We are doing a story on some of the blowback to the Schweizer book. We would like to ask Ms. Clinton's campaign this question: does the campaign refute anything in our independent reporting on the Colombia/Giustra story? I realize that the criticism of the Schweizer book is focused primarily on the author of the book, but our story was independently reported, was published weeks before Schweitzer's book was ever circulated, and had nothing at all to do with him - it was all our own enterprise reporting:

http://www.ibtimes.com/colombian-oil-money-flowed-clintons-state-department-took-no-action-prevent-labor-1874464

So we would like to know if the campaign has a substantive response to our story? Again, we know the criticism about Schweizer's book is about the author - but obviously, we are not him. So we are looking for any response about the reporting itself.

We reached out to the campaign for comment when we originally reported it and heard nothing back. But now with it back in the news because of the Schweizer book, we are doing a separate story. Can you help us with a comment from someone at the campaign? Thanks in advance - our deadline is Wednesday. I can always be reached at 720-754-4875.

TALKING POINTS: HILLARY CLINTON ON IMMIGRATION

KEY POINTS:

Hillary Clinton has been a vocal supporter of comprehensive immigration reform and a path to citizenship.

In the Senate, Hillary Clinton consistently voted in favor of comprehensive immigration reform.

Clinton is a supporter of the DREAM Act and advocated for it on the Senate floor.

In the Senate, Hillary Clinton introduced an amendment to reunite families separated by the immigration system. The amendment would have reclassified the spouses and minor children of lawful permanent residents as immediate relatives.

Clinton introduced a bill to restore access to Medicaid and SCHIP benefits for legal immigrant pregnant women and children.

Clinton introduced a bill to provide more funding for job training for people with limited English language skills.

BACKGROUND: HILLARY ON Immigration

Hillary Clinton: "I'm a huge supporter of immigration reform and a path to citizenship and will continue to advocate for that." As former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton recently told a tearful young undocumented immigrant, "I'm a huge supporter of immigration reform and a path to citizenship and will continue to advocate for that." Clinton's remarks came at the Clinton Foundation's "No Ceilings" forum in New York. Clinton went on to say, "I believe strongly we are missing a great opportunity by not welcoming people like you and 11 million others who have made contributions to our country into a legal status so you don't have to worry, you can go to school, you can work, you can pursue your dreams." Clinton also said she is "strongly in favor" of the bipartisan Senate bill and that the House's opposition is "a big missed opportunity for our country." [Washington Post,4/17/14]

Hillary Clinton has been a strong supporter of the DREAM Act. As Senator Clinton stated during a debate over the DREAM Act on the Senate floor, "There is a solution to this crisis, but sadly, the Senate today failed to act. The DREAM Act – which I have proudly cosponsored for several years – would help expand opportunities for our nation's immigrant children. For those students who have grown up in the United States, have demonstrated good moral character, and are pursuing a college education or have enlisted in the military, the DREAM Act will provide an opportunity to earn legal status in this country." [Clinton floor remarks, 10/24/07]

Sen. Clinton consistently voted in support of comprehensive immigration reform. In the Senate, Hillary Clinton voted for the bipartisan Comprehensive Immigration Reform Act of 2006 and voted to invoke cloture on S.1639, the 2007 comprehensive immigration reform bill. [Vote #157, S.2611, 5/25/06 , Vote #235, S.1639,6/28/07]

Sen. Clinton introduced legislation to restore access to Medicaid and SCHIP benefits for legal immigrant pregnant women and children. In 2007, Hillary introduced the Legal Immigrant Children's Health Improvement Act "which amends titles XIX (Medicaid) and XXI (Children's Health Insurance) (SCHIP) of the Social Security Act to grant states the option of covering certain categories of eligible pregnant women and child resident aliens, including targeted low-income children, under the Medicaid and SCHIP programs." [S.764,3/5/07]

Sen. Clinton introduced legislation to provide more job training funds for individuals with limited English language skills. In 2003, Hillary Clinton introduced the Access to Employment and English Language Acquisition Act which "Amends the Workforce Investment Act of 1998 to provide for: (1) job training that integrates occupational skills training with language acquisition; and (2) specified services for individuals who are Limited English Proficient (LEP). Authorizes the Secretary to award incentive grants to States for exemplary performance in carrying out integrated training programs." [S.1543, introduced, 7/31/03]

Sen. Clinton introduced an amendment to reunite families who had been separated by the immigration system. In 2007, during a debate over the Comprehensive Immigration Reform Act, Sen. Clinton introduced an amendment "to reclassify the spouses and minor children of lawful permanent residents as immediate relatives." As she said before the vote, "It is time to take all the rhetoric about family values and put it into action and show that we mean what we say when we talk about putting families first. That is what my amendment does. This amendment is a bipartisan amendment offered with Senator Hagel and Senator Menendez. It is our view we must make reuniting families a priority in our immigration system, that we should show compassion for those living apart from their spouses and minor children, that we should reform immigration in a way that honors families and brings them together." The bipartisan amendment, introduced with Sens. Hagel and Menendez failed, 44-53. [Vote # 195, 6/6/07]

TALKING POINTS: THE CLINTON GLOBAL INITIATIVE

BACKGROUND: The Clinton Global Initiative's annual meeting will take place in New York City on September 21-24.

TALKING POINTS:

The purpose of the Clinton Global Initiative is to find solutions to the world's most pressing challenges by bringing together the best minds and turning their ideas into action.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

CGI is nonpartisan and its members include global leaders with a wide array of backgrounds who are creating positive change around the world.

Here are just a few examples of the life-changing work developed as a result of the Clinton Global Initiative:

- Clinton Global Initiative members have made more than 2,900 Commitments to Action, which have already improved the lives of over 430 million people in more than 180 countries.
- The Clinton Global Initiative worked to secure funding commitments valued at $103 billion to spur innovative solutions to global challenges.
- In Africa alone, CGI members have committed $27.8 billion to projects and other participation.
- Procter & Gamble committed to providing more than 300 million liters of clean drinking water to more than 2 million people in the Horn of Africa through the Clinton Global Initiative.
- The Clinton Global Initiative America program addresses economic recovery and revitalization efforts in the U.S, including a $47 million plan to revitalize Birmingham and create hundreds of jobs.
- Clinton Global Initiative America partnered with a Kentucky town damaged by a tornado to build energy-efficient housing.
- Last year at CGI, the NAACP committed to addressing the impact of HIV/AIDS in the 30 U.S. cities that account for nearly two-thirds of the country's HIV cases.
- CGI established the U.S. Youth Employment Action Network to encourage companies to expand employment opportunities for America's youth.

The world is a better place because of programs like these.

Last year, the Clinton Global Initiative honored Bishop Elias Taban with a Global Citizen Award.

- Bishop Taban is a former child soldier from South Sudan who wrote an op-ed encouraging Sudan and South Sudan to end their conflict over oil production and transport fees so that both countries could move forward with development and growth.
- In the op-ed he wrote , "There must always come a point where we look forward and recognize the need to stop fighting over past wrongs so we can build toward a new future. That time has come for South Sudan. We must restart oil production and work out an agreement to transport it through north Sudan."
- Hillary Clinton was so inspired by his words that, while Secretary of State, she used his op-ed to convince the Sudan and South Sudan to reach a compromise.

TALKING POINTS: BENGHAZI DOCUMENT REVIEW

BACKGROUND: In the latest so-called Benghazi "bombshell," former State Department official Raymond Maxwell alleges that he and others conducted a review of documents related to Benghazi prior to handing them over to the Accountability Review Board.

TALKING POINTS:

This latest so-called Benghazi "bombshell" is without merit and has been strongly denied by the State Department.

- "A State Department spokesman calls the implication that documents were withheld 'totally without merit.'" [Daily Signal, 9/15/14]
- "Spokesman Alec Gerlach says 'The range of sources that the ARB's investigation drew on would have made it impossible for anyone outside of the ARB to control its access to information.'" [Daily Signal, 9/15/14]
- "Gerlach says the State Department instructed all employees to cooperate 'fully and promptly' with the ARB, which invited anyone with relevant information to contact them directly. 'So individuals with information were reaching out proactively to the board. And, the ARB was also directly engaged with individuals and the [State] Department's bureaus and offices to request information and pull on whichever threads it chose to,' says Gerlach." [Daily Signal, 9/15/14]

The Accountability Review Board was independent, exhaustive, and critical of the State Department.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- Following an examination of the Accountability Review Board process, the Inspector General concluded the Board operated "independently and without bias." [Special Review of the Accountability Review Board Process,September 2013]

- Ambassador Pickering testified that the ARB met "almost continuously" for two-and-a-half months, conducted nearly 100 interviews, reviewed thousands of pages of documents and viewed hours of video. He said that the Accountability Review Board "was provided with the fullest cooperation by the Department of State and all elements of the U.S. government." [House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform Hearing, 9/19/13]

- Press accounts at the time noted that the results of the Board "sharply criticized the State Department for a lack of seasoned security personnel and for relying on untested local militias to safeguard the compound." [New York Times, 12/18/12]

Maxwell has had the opportunity to bring up these allegations in the many interviews he's had with the media and members of Congress both before and after his retirement, yet has neglected to do so until now.

Maxwell, who retired in November 2013, was one of four State Department officials placed on paid administrative leave from his position in the bureau of Near Eastern Affairs as a result of the Accountability Review Board's findings. [New York Times, 12/19/12]

TALKING POINTS: HILLARY CLINTON AND SYRIA

BACKGROUND: This week, Congress voted in favor of President Obama's proposal to train and equip moderate Syrian rebels. While the bill passed by a wide majority in both the House and the Senate, some prominent members of Congress voted against the bill.

KEY POINTS:

As Secretary of State, Hillary Clinton was an early advocate of arming the moderate Syrian opposition. She "believed, at the time, they would be overwhelmed by Assad's military force and that they would open up the door to extremists coming in."

Hillary Clinton has repeatedly said that the situation in Syria is a "wicked problem" with no right answer.

- While she advocated arming and training the moderate Syrian opposition early on, she has said there is no way to predict if that would have worked, but she believed it was the best of the options available at the time.

Secretary Clinton has made clear that, even though she advocated a plan to arm the Syrian rebels, it was the "President's call" and she "respected his deliberations and decision."

HILLARY CLINTON'S STATEMENTS ON SYRIA:

- "Wicked problem ... a term used by planning experts to describe particularly complex challenges that confound standard solutions and approaches. Wicked problems rarely have a right answer; in fact, part of what makes them wicked is that every option appears worse than the next. Increasingly that's how Syria appeared." ["Hard Choices", CBS News, 6/5/14]

- "[T]he risks of both action and inaction were high. Both choices would bring unintended consequences. The Presidents' inclination was to stay the present course and not take the significant further step of arming rebels. No one likes to lose a debate, including me. But this was the President's call and I respected his deliberations and decision. From the beginning of our partnership, he had promised me that would always get a fair hearing. And I always did. In this case, my position didn't prevail." [Hard Choices, pg. 461, 2014]

- "I recommended that we do more in the very beginning to support the moderate opposition, because I believed, at the time, that they would be overwhelmed by Assad's military force and that they would open up the door to extremists coming in." [Politico, 6/17/14]

- "[T]he failure to help build up a credible fighting force of the people who were the originators of the protests against Assad… left a big vacuum, which the jihadists have now filled." [The Atlantic, 8/10/14]

- "Now the wicked problem has gotten even wickeder…This is not just a Syrian problem anymore…I could not have predicted the extent to which ISIS was effective in seizing cities in Iraq and taking over the region." [The Hill, 6/12/14]

- "You know, this is why I called the chapter on Syria 'A Wicked Problem.' I can't sit here today and say that if we had done what I recommended… that we'd be in a demonstrably different place." [The Atlantic, 8/10/14]

Hillary Clinton's RECENT STATEMENTS ON SYRIA

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sec. Clinton: None of the options on Syria "offered much hope of success," but "we had to keep at it." In her book Hard Choices, Secretary Clinton wrote, "I started referring to Syria as a 'wicked problem,' a term used by planning experts to describe particularly complex challenges that confound standard solutions and approaches. Wicked problems rarely have a right answer; in fact, part of what makes them wicked is that every option appears worse than the next. Increasingly that's how Syria appeared. Do nothing, and a humanitarian disaster envelops the region. Intervene militarily, and risk opening Pandora's box and wading into another quagmire, like Iraq. Send aid to the rebels, and watch it end up in the hands of extremists. Continue with diplomacy, and run head-first into a Russian veto. None of these approaches offered much hope of success. But we had to keep at it." [Hard Choices, pg. 461, 2014]

Sec. Clinton: Pres. Obama's inclination was to "not take the significant further step of arming rebels" in Syria. In her book Hard Choices, Secretary Clinton wrote, "Despite high-level support from the National Security Council, some in the White House were skeptical. After all, the President had been elected in large part because of his opposition to the war in Iraq and his promise to bring the troops home. Getting entangled in any way in another sectarian civil war in the Middle East was not what he had in mind when coming into office. And the President thought we needed more time to evaluate the Syrian opposition before escalating our commitment. The risks of both action and inaction were high. Both choices would bring unintended consequences. The President's inclination was to stay the present course and not take the significant further step of arming rebels." [Hard Choices, pg. 464, 2014]

Sec Clinton: Syria "was the President's call and I respected his deliberations and decision." In her book Hard Choices, Secretary Clinton wrote, "No one likes to lose a debate, including me. But this was the President's call and I respected his deliberations and decision. From the beginning of our partnership, he had promised me that I would always get a fair hearing. And I always did. In this case, my position didn't prevail." [Hard Choices, pg. 464, 2014]

Sec. Clinton, on Syria: "I can't sit here today and say that if we had done what I recommended, and what Robert Ford recommended, that we'd be in a demonstrably different place." In an interview with Jeffrey Goldberg for The Atlantic, Sec. Clinton said, regarding whether she agreed with U.S. Ambassador to Syria Robert Ford that the U.S. was at fault for not building a credible Syrian opposition, "I have the highest regard for Robert. I'm the one who convinced the administration to send an ambassador to Syria. You know, this is why I called the chapter on Syria 'A Wicked Problem.' I can't sit here today and say that if we had done what I recommended, and what Robert Ford recommended, that we'd be in a demonstrably different place." [The Atlantic, 8/10/14]

Sec. Clinton: "I did believe… that if we were to carefully vet, train, and equip early on a core group of the developing Free Syrian Army, we would… have some better insight into what was going on on the ground." In an interview with Jeffrey Goldberg for The Atlantic, Sec. Clinton said, regarding whether Israel had done enough to pursue peace, "Well, I did believe, which is why I advocated this, that if we were to carefully vet, train, and equip early on a core group of the developing Free Syrian Army, we would, number one, have some better insight into what was going on on the ground. Two, we would have been helped in standing up a credible political opposition, which would prove to be very difficult, because there was this constant struggle between what was largely an exile group outside of Syria trying to claim to be the political opposition, and the people on the ground, primarily those doing the fighting and dying, who rejected that, and we were never able to bridge that, despite a lot of efforts that Robert and others made." [The Atlantic, 8/10/14]

Sec. Clinton, on Syria: "I know that the failure to help build up a credible fighting force of the people who were the originators of the protests against Assad… the failure to do that left a big vacuum, which the jihadists have now filled." In an interview with Jeffrey Goldberg for The Atlantic, Sec. Clinton said, regarding whether ISIS would be in the same position it was if the U.S. had done more to build up a moderate Syrian opposition in 2011, "Well, I don't know the answer to that. I know that the failure to help build up a credible fighting force of the people who were the originators of the protests against Assad—there were Islamists, there were secularists, there was everything in the middle—the failure to do that left a big vacuum, which the jihadists have now filled. They were often armed in an indiscriminate way by other forces and we had no skin in the game that really enabled us to prevent this indiscriminate arming." [The Atlantic, 8/10/14]

Sec. Clinton, on Syria: "Now the wicked problem has gotten even wickeder." According to The Hill's coverage of Sec. Clinton's discussion at the Council on Foreign Relations, "In her new memoir Hard Choices, Clinton described Syria's civil war as a 'wicked problem.' 'Now the wicked problem has gotten even wickeder,' Clinton said Thursday at an event at the Council on Foreign Relations. 'This is not just a Syrian problem anymore.' A Sunni jihadi group, the Islamic State of Iraq and Syria (ISIS)—once part of al Qaeda—has gained control of large areas of Iraq and Syria over the last year. In recent days, ISIS seized key Iraqi cities such as Mosul and Tikrit. 'I could not have predicted the extent to which ISIS was effective in seizing cities in Iraq and taking over the region,' said the former secretary of State, who was America's top diplomat when the U.S. pulled out of Iraq in

Background Details:
- Event at GM plant - team Lordstown
- Small venue - 18 audience members on stage, 75 chairs and 10 standing
- Room is so small there is not enough for print reporters and traveling press. They are scrambling to see where they are gonna fit them.
- Stage has a large American flag, otherwise room is decorated with company banners and flags
- Press - local and embeds, including WRMJ (NBC), Fox, CBS, couple news reporters.

Speech Highlights:
- Thank yous.
- I'm here because I want to see what can be done to restore and retain jobs, but also move forward in addressing energy requirements and the great opportunity that lies in green technology.
- America is hurting now -- manufacturing jobs have left, we're struggling to compete. But let's talk about the future of the auto industry.
- It's gonna be long, hard and tough
- I have faith in the innovative ability of American and quality of our workers -- we have the best workers
- In the state of Ohio, more people have lost their homes than anywhere else.
- This issue is a nexis of national issues we face:
  - 1) national security issue -- dependent on nations that are bad for our oil supply
  - 2) environmental issue -- there's enough compelling information now that shows human activity is hurting the planet
- We can become energy independent and one of the ways we can do that is through the automotive industry -- hybrids
- But we also need nuclear energy, clean coal technology -- I'm willing to invest $2B a year in clean coal energy
- And I believe we can rebuild the automotive industry
- We can compete in the world; I am optimistic, but we have to take action
- A word about nuclear power -- the French 80% of their electricity comes from nuclear, the reprocess the waste
- We need to reprocess the waste but we need to store the waste as well -- including Yucca mountain
- None of these are the ultimate answer -- but you put them all together and it can work -- and we give the American worker more job opportunities and get them back in their homes
- We need better job training programs
- The same old jobs are not going to be there -- new jobs will be there, they'll be here in Lordstown
- I proposed a $300 million dollar prize for a battery -- it's been called a gimmick
- I wanted to give Americans a gas-tax holiday too -- wouldn't it be nice to give folks a break? I think so
- He have to have a whole broad array of initiatives to solve this
- And who's getting hurt the most? low-income, fix-income people with old cars
- Thanks for having me -- these meetings are a great part of the political process
- I'd like to take a moment to recognize and thank the veterans
- We're in two wars -- one in Iraq and Afghanistan
- After 4 years of mishandling -- we now have a good strategy and are succeeding
- I'd much rather lose a political campaign than a war

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- I look forward to this debate
- No one has contributed more than our solidiers
- It's gonna be a long, hard struggle but I believe we will win
- I'm here to tell you that -- no matter if you vote for me -- that I will reach across the aisle and I will always put my country first

Question and Answer:

Q 1) Yesterday Sen. Obama said the auto industry may need some bridges to reach this new technology. What do you think about that and what would you do?

MCCAIN: I will make the research and development tax credit permanent.
And I gotta give you some technology, once we develop that technology, I believe we should hand it over to private industry.
The Internet was created this way -- started by the federal government, then handed over to the private industry where it could be further developed. I am convinced we are not that far away from a pure electric car - it's the battery and we're almost there. It's a national priority. When we look at our dependency on foreign oil, the government has to be an active participant.

Q 2) Oil prices rising -- the American people are confused on what is causing this. What would you say to the American people?

MCCAIN: I believe the root cause is finite resource that a cartel controls and that many countries need and desire. That is first and foremost the major part of the problem.
There's got to be more transparency in this whole global market. And there's investigations going on. If more are needed, then we should do them. But really, the root cause is basically there's not really an expandable finite resource and we are seeing a growing demand.
If we develop/when we develop cars we can drive 100-200 miles, we are going to need more electricity. We need nuclear plants. We should have 45 new ones by the year 2030. My answer to you is the fundamental problem is there and we have to determine the role speculators have played.

Q 3) You are strictly against opening up any trade deficits. If our deficit is in the trillions, is there anyway we can make it more fair? Our manufacturing jobs are going. My plant closed.

MCCAIN: I don't believe every trade agreement is fair. We have had various disputes on the implentation of free trade agreements. I would say that if/when we conclude additional free trade agreements perhaps we can do a better job of preventing unfair practices. But I do believe there are some realities of life, that when we erect barriers to other countries, they do the same to us. I also think that when we look at countries in our own hemisphere, that if they had a better economy they would be better to deal with. We should conclude the free trade agreement with Columbia. I understand the pain. I will make sure our trade practices are fair. When I say we're for free trade, because I believe it's in the best interest of the U.S. I know we've lost manufacturing jobs -- I don't have to tell you to look at Detroit or the stock market -- but I don't think we are going to get the labor intensive jobs back in America. But I do think we're more innovative than any countries and other kinds of jobs will come.
That's no comfort to your colleagues I'm sure. But I will make sure everyone has a second chance.
I understand it, I will act as quickly as possible and I will provide relief as quickly as I can.

Thank you for being here today. I will be back.

ABC...EASY AS THE BIG G

THE STORY

Yesterday, Google announced a major re-structuring , and it's getting back to basics with some ABCs.

WHAT ARE YOU TALKING ABOUT?

Meet Alphabet . It's the new parent company that will manage Google and then all of Google's most eccentric ideas.

SO WHAT'S HAPPENING TO 'GOOGLE'?

Same old. It's still an Interwebs company that knows everything about you. And now it's just going to stay focused on the basics — search, advertising, Android, Chrome, maps, and YouTube. A guy named Sundar Pichai — senior VP of products at Google — will take over as CEO, freeing up Google co-founder Larry Page to work with co-founder Sergey Brin on Alphabet.

SO WHAT EXACTLY IS ALPHABET?

The parent company that now manages Google, but also the Jetson Life. The Alphabet portfolio will include all the ideas that have become a wee bit distracting to Google. Think: curing disease, trying to make us live longer, self-driving cars, developing nanoparticles, and making thermostats smarter.

theSKIMM

Google was founded as a search engine. But over the years, it's been chasing shiny new tech things that investors think distract from its money-maker . This re-structuring is a way for Google to have its core business and eat its Alphabet soup too.

HOMETOWN:

was born in Baton Rouge, LA.

FUN FACT:

Our third child was actually born at home…it was literally just my wife and me together on our bathroom floor next to our bedroom. By the time the ambulance got there, he was already born.

TELL US ABOUT YOURSELF.

was born in Baton Rouge, LA. My parents came there [from India] over 40 years ago. To me, they lived the American dream…the first time they ever got on a plane, they were coming halfway across the world to come to Baton Rouge.

SO WHY SHOULD AMERICA HIRE YOU?

think America is ready to hire a doer, not a talker. We've got a lot of people that are "talking" who are running for president. We've got a talker in the White House today. I'm the only candidate that has offered detailed plans on health care, on energy, on education, on our foreign policy…Secondly, I've got a track record of proven results. [Louisiana's] actually already cut the size of our budget [by] 26%….We've got a top ten state for private sector job creation. Look, if folks are looking for a candidate who's just going to manage the slow decline of our country, I'm not that candidate. If they're looking for somebody who will go to DC and make big changes, I'm the guy to do that. I've already done it in Louisiana, I'll do it in DC.

WHO SHOULD WE CALL FOR A REFERENCE?

'd call my wife, Supriya. She's my best friend. She's a straight shooter. She'll be honest, but she's also my best friend.

WHAT IS YOUR GREATEST STRENGTH?

'm not afraid of taking on big, complex programs. When I was elected governor, we were coming out of Katrina. We had had 25 years in a row of out-migration. We've now had seven years in a row of in-migration. We've got more people working there and earning a higher income than we have ever had before. So, I'm not afraid to take on the big complex problems, and I think that's what we need in DC right now…We'll be the next Greece if we don't grow the private sector economy.

WHAT IS YOUR GREATEST WEAKNESS?

'm impatient. I've been told my entire life I need to slow down, I speak too quickly.

WHERE DO YOU STAND ON THE FOLLOWING...

think that we have to accept the truth that you can either grow the private sector economy, or grow the government economy. You can't grow both. We've got to…shrink the federal government so we can grow the private sector economy. Today we are celebrating the fact that we've got a record-low participation rate in the workforce, we've got record-high dependence on food stamps. That's backwards!

HEALTHCARE.

think Obamacare was a mistake. It has made healthcare less affordable, not more affordable. We've created a new entitlement program, and we can't afford the ones we've got. It involves less freedom for patients and their doctors. I've actually outlined a plan…it does three things: one, it makes healthcare more affordable. So it gives a standard tax reduction, and allows people to buy health insurance across state lines. For accidental frivolous lawsuits, it creates voluntary purchasing programs, expands access to health savings, medical savings, and wellness accounts….Secondly, [the plan helps] the vulnerable. [It] gives $10 billion dollars a year to the states to help those with pre-existing conditions. And third, [the plan] puts patients and their doctors in control, not the bureaucrats.

THE IRAN NUCLEAR DEAL.

think it's a very bad deal for America, for Israel, for our allies. Just to start with, when the deal was announced, Syria and Assad — our enemies — rejoiced and celebrated. Israel and Netanyahu — our allies — rejected, criticized, condemned the deal. Initially [the president said] we're going to get rid of their enrichment capacities, and we're going to have anytime, anywhere inspections. Turns out, neither is true. I think a good deal would've said [Iran has] to get rid of all their centrifuges. They have to get rid of all their enriched uranium. [It would allow for] anytime, anywhere inspections [and] no pathway to a plutonium device…[It would also say] they have to release all of their American prisoners, and cut off all their connections to Hamas, Hezbollah, or any other terrorists groups. And then finally, they need to recognize the right of Israel to exist. We're in a position to actually be able to get a good deal. This is a bad deal, and I think Congress should vote it down.

GUN CONTROL.

'm for our Second Amendment rights…At the same time, we've also passed laws in Louisiana, since I've been governor, to strengthen the reporting of mental health cases into the national background check system. So, I fully support that, I think every state should do that…but at the same time I'm not for restricting our second amendment rights for law-abiding citizens.

WOULD YOU CHANGE ANYTHING ABOUT HOW THE US IS HANDLING THIS WHOLE SIS THING?

First, we need to be working with our Kurdish allies, directly arming and training them…Secondly, we need to encourage our Sunni allies. They will do more, their challenge is right now that they don't know that America is committed for the long run…Third, the president submitted an authorization for the use of military force to Congress — he needs to change two things about it: one, he needs to take out the ban on ground troops, and second, he needs take out the three-year deadline. There's no reason any commander in chief should ever tell the enemy what we will or won't do…I don't think that we should ever take an option off the table. We've gotta do what it takes to win…We've gotta have a president who actually, first off can identify the enemy and say our enemy is radical Islamic terrorism. We've got a president who's too politically correct to say that.

CLIMATE CHANGE.

n terms of whether human activity impacts the climate, I'm sure it does. In terms of how much or what should be done or the consequence, I'll leave that to the scientists. I'd say a couple of other things, though. One, if we can have affordable energy, we can have a clean environment and we can have a strong economy. They're not mutually exclusive….the second thing I'd say, is it makes no sense for us to take unilateral actions that will hurt our economy if we're not going to insist that other countries do the same. Especially countries we compete with and trade with.

MMIGRATION REFORM.

think our immigration policy right now is backwards. The first thing we need to do is secure our border, period. We don't need amnesty. We need to secure the border — we don't need a 1,000 page bill, we don't need a comprehensive bill. We've got a low wall and a narrow gate — by a low wall, it's too easy to come to the country illegally and by a narrow gate, it's too hard to come to the country legally. I think one of the dumbest things we do today is educate people and then kick them out of the country to compete against us. I do think that something that gets missed in the immigration debate is assimilation…My parents came to raise their kids here as Americans, they came to be Americans. If they didn't want that, they would've stayed in India. Now, they love India and they're proud of their heritage. I've said we need to get away from this African-American, Indian-American…you know, we're all Americans.

RIGHT TO CHOOSE. YES OR NO?

THE SUPREME COURT'S RULING ON GAY MARRIAGE. YES OR NO?

disagree with the ruling. I believe that marriage continues to be between a man and a woman.

WHAT WOULD YOU ASK THE WHITE HOUSE CHEF TO MAKE FOR YOUR FIRST MEAL AT 1600 PENNSYLVANIA AVE?

Nachos and chocolate chip cookies. I'm a bit of a gym rat, and there are some people that love to work out and then they tell you well if you work out, then you gotta eat healthy. I'm a little bit of the opposite.

HOW MANY TIMES DO YOU HIT SNOOZE IN THE AM?

actually don't, and after 18 years of marriage my wife and I have figured this out, because we are very different when it comes to this. I'm one of those people that gets up before the alarm goes off, no matter what time it's set. And my wife, not only does she like to hit snooze, she likes to set the clocks ahead of time.

HOW DO YOU TAKE YOUR COFFEE?

'm not a coffee drinker, it's more Diet Coke.

WHAT TO SAY WHEN YOUR BOSS TELLS YOU TO TRY A DIFFERENT APPROACH...

Feelin' like China. Yesterday, China devalued the yuan — aka its currency – by a lot. Until now, the country's central bank has kept a tight leash on the value of the yuan. But yesterday, it announced that its value will depend more on markets. Meaning the Chinese gov.'s currency manipulation will matter less, and demand for buying Chinese goods will matter more. China's economy has been in a serious summer slump, and the devalued currency will make goods cheaper – which is good for China, but bad for its competitors. Other Asian currencies took a hit at the news.

WHAT PEOPLE ARE TALKING ABOUT...

Ferguson. Yesterday, officials declared a state of emergency in St. Louis County, MO. This happened just a day after the one-year anniversary of the death of Michael Brown, the unarmed black teen who was shot and killed by a white police officer. Brown's death last year sparked massive protests, and at times violent clashes, in Ferguson and around the country, and put a spotlight on racial inequality and police brutality. The anniversary of Brown's death is becoming a bad deja vu for many. Overnight, about two dozen people were arrested by police during violent protests. And yesterday morning, police say a man opened fire on officers. They fired back, critically injuring the man. The man is now being charged with assault.

WHAT TO SAY WHEN YOU HIT 'CHECKOUT'...

Pulling a Buffett. Yesterday, Warren Buffett — Berkshire Hathaway's CEO and 'everyman billionaire' — announced his biggest deal ever . Berkshire Hathaway will buy Precision Castparts for $32 billion. Precision's a supplier that provides glamorous things like fasteners and turbine blades to aircraft companies. The purchase rounds out Berkshire Hathway's all-you-can-buy Buffett. It's already taken over companies like Heinz, Duracell, and a big railroad company. This comes during a big year for M&A, with deals like this and this going down. In other news, Buffett likes to call Berkshire's cash reserve for large acquisitions his "elephant gun." That's all.

WHAT TO SAY WHEN YOU DON'T HAVE TIME TO SHOWER...

Feeling dirty. Colorado can relate. Last week, an EPA-supervised cleanup crew accidentally opened a dam inside an old mine that had been shut since the 1920s. The mistake sent toxic water flowing into a river. Oops. Then yesterday, it came out that the spill was actually three times as large as everyone thought. Bigger oops. It's unclear how the spill will affect drinking water and the fish who want to just keep swimming. What's clear is that the spill contains high amounts of toxic metals, and Colorado's gov. has declared a state of emergency.

Washington Post blog: PostPartisan: Jonathan Capehart: "Hillary Clinton's consolation prize for Brooklyn"

By Jonathan Capehart

February 5, 2015, 10:37 a.m. EST

Amie Parnes of the Hill reports that the as-yet-announced presidential campaign of Hillary Rodham Clinton will likely be headquartered in Brooklyn. One knowledgeable Democratic strategist told me that the consultants prefer the Big Apple's largest borough to someplace in Westchester because it would be easier to get to and out of. But putting the campaign in Brooklyn would have another benefit: consolation prize.

Any day now, the Democratic National Committee will announce its choice for its 2016 presidential nominating convention. Brooklyn, Philadelphia and Columbus, Ohio, are the finalists. By now, you know I think Philadelphia should get the quadrennial jamboree. I recognize the power of having Clinton officially accept the nomination (assuming she runs and secures the required delegates) in her home state 24 years after her ex-president husband did the same in the Big Apple. Still, there are significant issues with hosting the convention in Brooklyn, which is why the money is on the City of Brotherly Love.

That's why the leak about Clinton considering Brooklyn for her campaign headquarters is so intriguing. The borough could lose the convention but gain the campaign. It could dodge the bullet of the four-day convention (and the headaches for all concerned that would entail) but bask in the glow of a 16-month presidential operation. There are issues with putting the campaign there, too. Being the capital of hyper-expensive Hipstervania is one. Actually, that might be its biggest knock. That, and being the center of action for HBO's "Girls." But in touting Brooklyn for the convention, New York City Council Member Vincent Gentile gave a rationale for why Clinton should make the borough her HQ. "One in seven Americans can trace their roots to Brooklyn so history shows Brooklyn is at the crossroads of our country," he said last year. "We are a true mosaic of our country and of the world. Clearly Brooklyn is America and America is Brooklyn."

Can't argue with that.

Bloomberg: "Why Starbucks's CEO Is Resisting Calls For Him to Run for the White House"

By Ali Elkin

February 5, 2015, 12:15 p.m. EST

[Subtitle:] The Democrat says he is content to "see what Hillary does."

Starbucks CEO Howard Schultz says he does not have designs on the White House, according to a Time cover story published Thursday.

"For his part, Schultz insists he's not interested in running for office at the moment and has neither the temperament to make the compromises necessary to embark on a Democratic political career nor the desire to be a third-party candidate. 'I don't think that is a solution. I don't think it ends well.' ... For now, Schultz says, he's content to 'see what Hillary [Clinton] does.'"

Entertainment magnate David Geffen told the magazine that he thinks Schultz has what it takes.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I first told Howard he should run back in 2008,” Geffen said. “We were having a very intense conversation about things that were happening in the country, and Howard had a strong point of view about various things ... We both felt there was a lot of corruption in government and a lack of conviction to put things right.”

Anti-tax activist Grover Norquist also weighed in on the possibility of Schultz running. “'You should run for office' is what people in this country say to you when they mean ‘I like your ideas. I wish people in Washington thought like you did,'” he said, according to the magazine. “That’s what Ralph Nader’s friends said to him, and when he ran, they screamed at it and said, ‘Hey, you are funneling money away from the mainstream of the party!'”

Los Angeles Times: “The Envelope 'Virunga' details a complicated story of oil exploration in Congo”

By Janet Kinosian

February 5, 2015, 7:20 a.m. EST

When filmmaker Orlando von Einsiedel first arrived in eastern Congo to film what ultimately became the Oscar-nominated documentary "Virunga," he'd hoped to showcase an inspiring story of about 500 lionhearted park rangers who risk their lives to protect UNESCO World Heritage Site Virunga National Park — one of the world's most iconic and bio-diverse spots — and the threatened mountain gorillas that reside within.

What he found appeared to be far more complicated — SOCO International, a British-based oil and gas exploration company, was in the Democratic Republic of Congo with a government concession for oil exploration beneath the park.

The film was seen by Bill and Hillary Rodham Clinton at a special screening last weekend and has already screened for the United Nations, British Parliament, the European Parliament, on Capitol Hill and for many of SOCO's investors; "Virunga" illuminates "true African heroes," says Von Einsiedel.

Between poachers and a military rebellion devastating the country's eastern region, 130 rangers have died since the mid-1990s.

"Virunga" is really several important films woven into one. What was the initial story you arrived to tell?

I'd worked a lot in Africa as an investigative journalist, and I'd come across incredibly inspiring people amid these rather depressing stories on violence and injustice. "Virunga" was originally a human story about the park rangers risking their lives to protect mountain gorillas and trying to rebuild their country [known as Zaire until 1997] after 20 years of war and conflict. That's the story I went there to tell.

So you knew or didn't know about SOCO International when you first started to film?

I had no idea. But when I got there I learned very quickly of the park's concern about the oil company and I saw that what I could contribute to the fight was technology. In terms of the film, it started to look like three separate films: an investigative PBS "Frontline"-type film, a National Geographic film and a kind of war movie. This suddenly became something that was so much bigger than anything I'd ever done before. But I always felt they were so interrelated they had to be told together.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Park director Emmanuel de Merode, who opposes all such oil exploration, was ambushed last year, shot four times. Is he OK?

The thing with Emmanuel — and I spent a year with him on the ground — is he is the real deal. He is exactly what he is in the film, and his resolve is as steel and incredible. After he was shot and nearly killed, he was back at work in about 35 days. He's made of truly tough stuff.

Another featured ranger, Rodrigue Katembo, you say acted as an undercover agent, really. How did you connect with him?

He said he'd been approached by people claiming to represent SOCO and was offered money to work against the park. He quickly learned how to use the undercover cameras and very quickly started bringing back this incredible footage. He was also jailed for 17 days after he stopped some people [who said they were] working on behalf of SOCO from building a radio antenna for mobile phones inside the park; the next day he was arrested, beaten up and tortured. He said he was told that if he ever opposed the oil exploration again, next time he'll be killed.

[SOCO International officials could not be reached for comment, but in a 2012 Associated Press article about the situation, the company responded, "SOCO vigorously denies any allegations of impropriety ... {and} does not permit the giving or receiving of bribes." The company's website states that "SOCO's operations inside Virunga National Park ceased on 22 July, 2014 and elsewhere {near Lake Edward} on 11 August, 2014."]

What have you heard from them — has there been significant pushback?

We wrote them and said here's our list of allegations. What's your response? And they wrote us back a 20-page legal letter denying everything and basically saying if you screen this film we reserve the right to sue you.

Then they wrote to the festivals we were going to screen it at and said, "If you screen this film, we believe it's defamatory and we might sue you." And then when it first came out they wrote to loads of journalists who reviewed it and they said, "Take the reviews down from the Internet; if you don't we will sue you." Just incredibly aggressive.

The gorillas are so joyous and gentle in the film. Not quite what I expected.

They are so very, very gentle. Their forest has been bombed for four or five months repeatedly and the first humans the gorillas come across afterward are the rangers, and rather than become angry and lash out, "What have you been doing to us?" they just want to gently and lovingly touch them.

What has been the rangers' response and reaction to all the attention and awards directed at the film?

I think they understood that we were all working together to create this tool that could show the world what was happening in the park. It's not just to protect it for the Congolese people, but also for humanity. If this iconic place isn't protectable, what is?

Slate: “NBC’s Bad Memory”

By Alec MacGillis

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

February 5, 2015, 12:45 p.m. EST

[Subtitle:] The network repeatedly criticized Hillary Clinton for her false memory of “sniper fire.” Will it hold Brian Williams to the same standard?

Questions are swirling about NBC Nightly News anchor Brian Williams’ guarded acknowledgment Wednesday night that he had, over the years, falsely claimed to have been in a helicopter that came under rocket-propelled grenade fire in Iraq in 2003. But NBC itself has been mostly mum about the matter, and MSNBC has given it only the briefest of mentions.

This is in stark contrast to the network’s coverage of a quite similar matter in 2008: Hillary Clinton’s false claim to have arrived in Tuzla, Bosnia under sniper fire in 1996, when coverage of her visit at the time showed her being greeted leisurely by an 8-year-old with a welcoming poem. From what I can tell from the transcripts at the time, Williams did not directly address Clinton’s exaggerations on the air when they were covered by NBC Nightly News. But his colleagues at NBC and MSNBC hammered away at Clinton repeatedly over several weeks for her dishonesty and carelessness. Some examples, with some especially tart comments highlighted:

Meet the Press, March 23, 2008:

Tim Russert: Yesterday in the column called “Fact Checker” by Michael Dobbs in the Washington Post, Dobbs wrote this, “Clinton’s tale of landing at the Tuzla Airport under sniper fire and then running for cover is simply not credible. Photographs and video of the arrival ceremony combined with contemporaneous news reports tell a very different story. Four Pinocchios,” which is the highest you can get, which means a whopper in terms of exaggeration.

… It’s a credibility issue, truth-telling—is this a problem for Sen. Clinton?

Chuck Todd: Well, it’s been the nagging things about this whole campaign. When you ask that question of honest and trustworthy, she has always consistently scored lower than Obama. … But, I, for the life of me, haven’t understood why they have pushed this story. They knew that somebody went after and re-interviewed Sinbad, who was on that trip, the former “comedian,” and I put comedian in quotes. That he was on that trip and doesn't remember it being that harried or anything like that, and yet she went out and retold the story. … They didn't need to retell the story because if they had not, then they wouldn’t have gotten this four Pinocchio thing out of the Washington Post and given the Obama campaign something to hit them with.

Today Show, March 25, 2008:

Matt Lauer: So let’s talk about this trip to Bosnia March of 1996. Here’s how Hillary Clinton described it last week: “I remember landing under sniper fire. There was supposed to be some kind of a greeting ceremony at the airport, but instead we just ran with our heads down to get into the vehicles and get to our base.” Now, I still remember winning a Little League championship single-handedly when I was 10, probably didn’t happen. But this isn’t the Little League, this is someone running for president. There were reporters on this trip and she’s using her experience as a deciding factor. How could this happen?

Chuck Todd: Well, and it’s worse than that, Matt. There had been reporters questioning her story on this a few weeks ago. One even reached out to the comedian Sinbad, who was also on this trip, to get his recollection of it and it differed from the first lady. So somebody didn’t scrub that speech. It was in prepared remarks last week, and not only did she say it with certitude, but it was in her prepared text. So this was a real sort of bone-headed mistake on the campaign’s part at a time when everybody is looking at everything so carefully.

Lauer: Right, and does it make people now go back and start to question everything she said?

Countdown, March 27, 2008:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Keith Olbermann: Forgetting about Bosnia. The March 17 misspeak was just she said, sleep deprivation or something. But now, two other Bosnia misspeaks have turned up. Were they sleep deprivation, too?

Speaking of Bosnia, it turns out Sen. Clinton was speaking of Bosnia and gunfire and danger last December. Is that sleep deprivation chronic?

Hardball, April 7, 2008:

Chris Matthews: That said, [for Obama to run ads about] Tuzla doesn't require any nastiness toward Sen. Clinton. It requires playing over and over again a fish story that she was under enemy fire, a very elaborate kind of story about wartime and risk and courage and survival that turned out not to be at all true. Who would hold that against Barack? I can imagine Mark Penn running series of ads over and over again. I can imagine a saturation campaign. Why doesn't he do what Hillary would do?

What's especially striking about the comparison of the scandal over Clinton's Tuzla's claims—which unquestionably wounded her already listing campaign against Barack Obama—was that Williams made some of his false claims about the Iraq helicopter attack directly after Clinton was slammed over Tuzla. In a May 12, 2008 blog post, he wrote:

"A young soldier, who is, like me, from the Jersey Shore, reads my blog entry last week during a break while on active duty in Iraq. The last time I saw him, I was with my friend and NBC News Military Analyst Wayne Downing, a retired 4-Star Army General. Wayne and I were riding along as part of an Army mission to deliver bridge components to the Euphrates River, so that the invading forces of the 3rd Infantry could cross the river on their way to Bagdhad. We came under fire by what appeared to be Iraqi farmers with RPG's and AK-47's. The Chinook helicopter flying in front of ours (from the 101st Airborne) took an RPG to the rear rotor, as all four of our low-flying Chinooks took fire. We were forced down and stayed down—for the better (or worse) part of 3 days and 2 nights."

Williams had seen what happened to Clinton just weeks earlier, yet kept telling his own fish tale. To paraphrase one of his own NBC colleagues, this isn't Little League, it's a nightly news anchor with an audience of millions. Will he be held to the same standards to which NBC and the rest of the media held Clinton?

Washington Post blog: In The Loop: "Scholars rank Kerry dead last in terms of effectiveness."

By Al Kamen

February 5, 2015 7:00 a.m. EST

Secretary of State John Kerry, working diligently on some extraordinarily difficult foreign policy issues — China, neo-Soviet Russia, Islamic State, Iran, etc — isn't getting even a tiny bit of credit these days from the tweedy, elbow-patched, wing-chair crowd.

Foreign Policy magazine this week announced the results of its 2014 Ivory Tower survey of 1,615 international relations scholars from 1,375 U.S. colleges.

One question they were asked was: "Who was the most effective U.S. secretary of state of the past 50 years?

The winner? Nobel Peace Prize winner Henry A. Kissinger, who was secretary for four years during the Nixon and Ford administrations. Since the Vietnam thing didn't turn out so well, the scholars must have been grading him on openings to China and the Soviet Union when he was at the National Security Council?

Kissinger got 32.21 percent of the vote, extraordinary in such a large field.

"Don't Know" came in a relatively distant second, with 18.32 percent.

James Baker — who was actually the most effective secretary in the last 50 years — came in third at 17.71 percent, just behind Dr. Know.

Madeleine Albright and Hillary Clinton tied for fourth at 8.70 percent.

George Shultz was sixth with 5.65 percent.

Dean Rusk, who served in the Kennedy-Johnson years, came in seventh at 3.51 percent.

Warren Christopher got 1.53 percent, tying Cyrus Vance for eighth place

Colin Powell was picked by 1.07 percent for tenth place.

Condoleezza Rice got the nod from 0.46 percent putting her in 11th place.

Lawrence Eagleburger came in 12th place with only 0.31 percent.

Then, dead last, is John Kerry. He also got a total of only five votes and tied Eagleburger's 0.31 percent, but the magazine lists him at 13th.

This is all truly odd. Loop Fans may recall Eagleburger was only secretary of state for six weeks, from Dec. 8, 1992 to Jan. 20 1993. To be sure, he was acting secretary for three months before that, but it's hard to say he left a huge diplomatic footprint.

(On the other hand, we always marveled at Eagleburger's unerring ability to keep from blowing himself up as he alternated an inhaler in his right hand and a cigarette in his left.)

Odder still, the survey apparently forget that Nixon's first secretary of state was William P. Rogers.

Well, Kerry's only been at Foggy Bottom for only a couple years, so he's got plenty of time to boost his standing. Nowhere to go but up with this scholarly crowd.

Subject: Support Obama on Nuclear Weapons

Dear John,

Next week, President Obama is hosting the leaders of 46 countries at a summit in Washington to address the global nuclear threat. Hopes for the summit are high. Russia and the United States have come to an agreement to reduce their strategic nuclear arsenals by a third each. This is the most significant arms control treaty in decades, and a crucial first step to global zero—the worldwide elimination of nuclear weapons.

For those of us who served, and are serving, there is no more important thing America can do than avoid wars before they become necessary to wage. In a world where our enemies use terrorist tactics – not conventional warfare – to attack us, diffusing nuclear tensions with other nations in the world makes sense as a means to build alliances, not new enemies. Additionally, the more we rid the world of nuclear weapons, the fewer 'loose nukes' are around to be purchased by terrorists who would use them against us.

Will you stand with us to let world leaders know that we stand behind President Obama's efforts?

We're partnering in this effort with Global Zero, an international movement of activists, experts, political and religious leaders which will deliver the petition to the White House in April 12. The Global Zero petition and action plan are backed by hundreds of former heads of state, foreign ministers, national security advisers and military commanders.

Barack Obama, 2007

Thank you so much. To the great Governor of Iowa and Lieutenant. Governor of Iowa. To my dear friend Tom Harkin for the outstanding work that he does. To the congressional delegation of Iowa that is doing outstanding work and to Nancy Pelosi , Madam Speaker, thank you all for the wonderful welcome and the wonderful hospitality.

[Responding to audience] I love you back.

A little less than one year from today, you will go into the voting booth and you will select the President of the United States of America. Now, here's the good news -- the name George W. Bush will not be on the ballot. The name of my cousin Dick Cheney will not be on the ballot. We've been trying to hide that for a long time. Everybody has a black sheep in the family. The era of Scooter Libby justice, and Brownie incompetence, and Karl Rove politics will finally be over.

But the question you're going to have to ask yourself when you caucus in January and you vote in November is, "What's next for America?" We are in a defining moment in our history. Our nation is at war. The planet is in peril. The dream that so many generations fought for feels as if it's slowly slipping away. We are working harder for less. We've never paid more for health care or for college. It's harder to save and it's harder to retire. And most of all we've lost faith that our leaders can or will do anything about it.

We were promised compassionate conservatism and all we got was Katrina and wiretaps. We were promised a uniter, and we got a President who could not even lead the half of the country that voted for him. We were promised a more ethical and more efficient government, and instead we have a town called Washington that is more corrupt and more wasteful than it was before. And the only mission that was ever accomplished is to use fear and falsehood to take this country to a war that should have never been authorized and should have never been waged.

It is because of these failures that America is listening, intently, to what we say here today -- not just Democrats, but Republicans and Independents who've lost trust in their government, but want to believe again.

And it is because of these failures that we not only have a moment of great challenge, but also a moment of great opportunity. We have a chance to bring the country together in a new majority -- to finally tackle problems that George Bush made far worse, but that had festered long before George Bush ever took office -- problems that we've talked about year after year after year after year.

And that is why the same old Washington textbook campaigns just won't do in this election. That's why not answering questions, because we are afraid our answers won't be popular just won't do. That's why telling the American people what we think they want to hear instead of telling the American people what they need to hear just won't do. Triangulating and poll-driven positions because we're worried about what Mitt or Rudy might say about us just won't do. If we are really serious about wining this election Democrats, we can't live in fear of losing it.

This party -- the party of Jefferson and Jackson; of Roosevelt and Kennedy -- has always made the biggest difference in the lives of the American people when we led, not by polls, but by principle; not by calculation, but by conviction; when we summoned the entire nation to a common purpose -- a higher purpose. And I run for the Presidency of the United States of America because that's the party America needs us to be right now.

A party that offers not just a difference in policies, but a difference in leadership.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A party that doesn't just focus on how to win but why we should. A party that doesn't just offer change as a slogan, but real, meaningful change -- change that America can believe in. That's why I'm in this race. That's why I am running for the Presidency of the United States of America -- to offer change that we can believe in.

I am in this race to tell the corporate lobbyists that their days of setting the agenda in Washington are over. I have done more than any other candidate in this race to take on lobbyists -- and won. They have not funded my campaign, they will not get a job in my White House, and they will not drown out the voices of the American people when I am President. I'm in this race to take those tax breaks away from companies that are moving jobs overseas and put them in the pockets of hard working Americans who deserve it. And I won't raise the minimum wage every ten years -- I will raise it to keep pace so that workers don't' fall behind.

That is why I am in it. To protect the American worker. To fight for the American worker.

I'm in this race because I want to stop talking about the outrage of 47 million Americans without health care and start actually doing something about it. I expanded health care in Illinois by bringing Democrats and Republicans together. By taking on the insurance industry. And that is how I will make certain that every single American in this country has health care they can count on and I won't do it twenty years from now, I won't do it ten years from now, I will do it by the end of my first term as President of the United States of America.

I run for president to make sure that every American child has the best education that we have to offer -- from the day they are born to the day they graduate from college. And I won't just talk about how great teachers are -- as President I will reward them for their greatness -- by raising salaries and giving them more support. That's why I'm in this race.

I am running for President because I am sick and tired of democrats thinking that the only way to look tough on national security is by talking, and acting, and voting like George Bush Republicans.

When I am this party's nominee, my opponent will not be able to say that I voted for the war in Iraq; or that I gave George Bush the benefit of the doubt on Iran; or that I supported Bush-Cheney policies of not talking to leaders that we don't like. And he will not be able to say that I wavered on something as fundamental as whether or not it is ok for America to torture -- because it is never ok. That's why I am in it.

As President, I will end the war in Iraq. We will have our troops home in sixteen months. I will close Guantanamo. I will restore habeas corpus. I will finish the fight against Al Qaeda. And I will lead the world to combat the common threats of the 21st century -- nuclear weapons and terrorism; climate change and poverty; genocide and disease. And I will send once more a message to those yearning faces beyond our shores that says, "You matter to us. Your future is our future. And our moment is now."

America, our moment is now.

Our moment is now.

I don't want to spend the next year or the next four years re-fighting the same fights that we had in the 1990s.

I don't want to pit Red America against Blue America, I want to be the President of the United States of America.

And if those Republicans come at me with the same fear-mongering and swift-boating that they usually do, then I will take them head on. Because I believe the American people are tired of fear and tired of distractions and tired of diversions. We can make this election not about fear, but about the future. And that won't just be a Democratic victory; that will be an American victory.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And that is a victory America needs right now.

I am not in this race to fulfill some long-held ambitions or because I believe it's somehow owed to me. I never expected to be here, I always knew this journey was improbable. I've never been on a journey that wasn't.

I am running in this race because of what Dr. King called "the fierce urgency of now." Because I believe that there's such a thing as being too late. And that hour is almost upon us.

I don't want to wake up four years from now and find out that millions of Americans still lack health care because we couldn't take on the insurance industry.

I don't want to see that the oceans have risen a few more inches. The planet has reached a point of no return because we couldn't find a way to stop buying oil from dictators.

I don't want to see more American lives put at risk because no one had the judgment or the courage to stand up against a misguided war before we sent our troops into fight.

I don't want to see homeless veterans on the streets. I don't want to send another generation of American children to failing schools. I don't want that future for my daughters. I don't want that future for your sons. I do not want that future for America.

I'm in this race for the same reason that I fought for jobs for the jobless and hope for the hopeless on the streets of Chicago; for the same reason I fought for justice and equality as a civil rights lawyer; for the same reason that I fought for Illinois families for over a decade.

Because I will never forget that the only reason that I'm standing here today is because somebody, somewhere stood up for me when it was risky. Stood up when it was hard. Stood up when it wasn't popular. And because that somebody stood up, a few more stood up. And then a few thousand stood up. And then a few million stood up. And standing up, with courage and clear purpose, they somehow managed to change the world.

That's why I'm running, Iowa -- to give our children and grandchildren the same chances somebody gave me.

That's why I'm running, Democrats -- to keep the American Dream alive for those who still hunger for opportunity, who still thirst for equality.

That's why I'm asking you to stand with me, that's why I'm asking you to caucus for me, that's why I am asking you to stop settling for what the cynics say we have to accept. In this election -- in this moment -- let us reach for what we know is possible. A nation healed. A world repaired. An America that believes again. Thank you very much everybody.

Hillary Clinton to Jewish donors: I'll be better for Israel than Obama

But the former secretary of state is sending mixed signals on the president's Iran deal.

By Kenneth P. Vogel and Tarini Parti
7/3/15 6:33 AM EDT
Updated 7/3/15 6:33 AM EDT

Hillary Clinton is privately signaling to wealthy Jewish donors that — no matter the result of the Iranian nuclear negotiations — she will be a better friend to Israel than President Barack Obama.

But, even as donors increasingly push Clinton on the subject in private, they have emerged with sometimes widely varying interpretations about whether she would support a prospective deal, according to interviews with more than 10 influential donors and fundraising operatives.

Clinton's private responses in some ways resemble a foreign policy Rorschach test; donors who see a deal as important to world peace have come away thinking that Clinton shares their perspective, but so, too, do donors who oppose any prospective agreement as compromising Israeli security.

Publicly, she's expressed support for the negotiating process, which she secretly initiated during her time as secretary of state, but has also said "no deal is better than a bad deal."

With the talks heading into the home stretch in Vienna, the issue is emerging as an early test for Clinton's presidential campaign. She's already struggling to balance two of her biggest strengths as a candidate — her deep foreign policy track record and her vaunted fundraising ability — and that balance could become even trickier if there's a deal.

"Whatever way you go, there will be some people who won't like it," said Sarah Kovner, a prominent New York donor who is a leading bundler for Clinton's campaign and worked in Bill Clinton's presidential administration. "You can't have everybody with you. You've got to do what you think is right for the country."

The negotiations are of intense interest for some Jewish donors whose political giving is animated by their support for Israel. They're being counted on by Clinton's allies to donate huge sums for a campaign and a pair of supportive super PACs that, taken together, are expected to raise $2 billion or more.

Clinton's campaign rejected any suggestion that she's trying to have it both ways on Iran.

"Her support for the negotiating process and touting support for Israel are not contradictory," said Clinton spokesman Nick Merrill. "A strong deal is good for Israel in her view."

And several people who've heard her address the issue say the fact that different people can come away with such different interpretations is a testament to her nuanced approach to the issue and her skill as a politician, rather than any vacillation on the subject.

"That's just smart politics," said one donor who supports the negotiations and recently talked to her about them. "Because, right now, you have the freedom to say all those things, so why would you commit and box yourself in until you saw what the deal was?"

Clinton recently told another pro-deal donor that she was "very supportive of the negotiating process," the donor recalled, while a third funder said she boasted of her role in starting the talks. "So it seemed like she was supporting it," recalled the funder.

And, at a Manhattan fundraiser last week featuring a largely Jewish group of donors, Clinton defended Obama against charges he had weakened the U.S.-Israel relationship, asserting that such criticism stemmed from a "perception" problem, according to a donor who was present. But she also suggested that if she were elected president she could correct that problem and bring the two nations closer.

"Diplomacy is all about personal relationships, and I've got my own relationships," she said, referencing her two-decade association with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, an ardent opponent of the Iran deal and, occasionally, of Obama. Clinton even cited her rapport with former Israeli ambassador to the U.S. Michael Oren, who last week published a book that was brutally critical of the Obama administration and was timed for release to try to stymie the Iran deal. "I know Michael well, but I haven't read the book," she said.

At a fundraiser last month at the Long Island home of Democratic donor Jay Jacobs, Clinton was asked by an Orthodox rabbi about threats to Israel's security. “She did stress in no uncertain terms her full and fervent support of the state of Israel and the defense of the state of Israel,” recalled Jacobs. “And the people in the audience who heard it seemed to be comfortable with her answer.”

Likewise, donors at a different New York fundraiser seemed to fully accept her answer to a slightly different question about the U.S. interest in the deal, said billionaire hedge fund manager Marc Lasry, a leading Clinton donor. “She said ‘I’m going to do what’s in the best interest of the U.S.,’ and that was the end of it,” Lasry said.

Dan Berger, a Philadelphia lawyer and major Democratic donor who supports the framework of a deal, cautioned that the interests of the U.S. and Israel, “although close, are not identical. It might not be in the best interest of American Jews, but it’s got to be in the best interest of the majority of the people.” He urged Jewish donors “to take a step back and look at the complexity and judge the agreement based on its merits,” adding: “I’d hope Hillary would judge it based on its merits and not on political support.”

Lasry rejected the suggestion that Clinton would even consider the fundraising implications when assessing any deal.

But Clinton’s senior foreign policy advisers have briefed interested wealthy donors on both the negotiations over the deal and its prospects for congressional approval, according to one donor who recently talked to a top Clinton aide.

“It’s a tricky issue for her,” said the donor who was briefed, arguing that Jewish donors who oppose a deal and favor military intervention in Iran “are going to put her in a box.”

Clinton’s allies are carefully monitoring the sensitivities of a handful of hawkish Democratic mega-donors for signs that the Iran talks may be influencing their willingness to write million-dollar super PAC checks. Chief among that group is billionaire Hollywood entrepreneur Haim Saban, who sources say has spoken multiple times with Clinton and her top aides about the deal.

In April, he strongly suggested that Clinton opposed the deal. “I know where she stands, but I can’t talk about it,” Saban told an Israeli television news channel, adding under questioning, “She has an opinion, a very well-defined opinion. And in any case, everything that she thinks and everything she has done and will do will always be for the good of Israel. We don’t need to worry about this.”

He soon backtracked, saying “I have no idea what Hillary thinks about the Iran deal.”

And multiple prominent Jewish donors who joined Saban at a White House meeting with Obama in April to discuss the Iran negotiations said Saban expressed open-mindedness about supporting the deal, though one participant suggested his opinion shouldn't hold as much weight as those of foreign policy professionals.

"Haim Saban is a very smart businessman who has a tremendous amount of love for the Clintons, but I don't think he is the most sophisticated policy analyst that there is," said the donor.

Saban's representatives did not respond to questions about his interactions with Clinton.

But on Thursday, POLITICO reported that he donated $2 million this year to a super PAC supporting her presidential campaign, which Democratic finance sources interpreted as a sign that Saban's financial support will not be conditioned on Clinton taking a certain stance on the Iran deal.

Steve Rabinowitz, a Democratic consultant who worked in the Clinton White House and was a co-founder of Jewish Americans Ready for Hillary, argued that the Iran deal isn't going to be a deciding issue for either donors or voters.

"Do people in my community talk about the Iran deal? Sure. But is it affecting their support for Hillary Clinton? No," he said. "Iran certainly will — and already has — become a talking point, but it will not move three votes or $3."

Clinton has the potential to bring along donors like Saban who might have been skeptical of negotiating with Iran, argued the Long Island donor Jacobs. "Hillary has a lot of credibility and support in the Jewish community. It's broad and deep. People understand that she has fought and has been there as an advocate," he said. "So when she speaks on the issue, there will be more people in the Jewish community who have perhaps unfairly not appreciated President Obama's support who will at least give her view a more open-minded assessment."

If Clinton backs any eventual deal, its proponents will be under pressure to step up their giving — both to the Clinton super PACs and to pro-deal groups — because she is likely to come under heavy fire from deep-pocketed groups that oppose the deal.

"If there's a deal, and she comes out in favor of it, you can be sure there will be a great deal of fire trained on her," said Noah Pollak, the executive director of the Emergency Committee for Israel. The conservative group has worked to rally opposition to the talks and this week began airing an ad pressuring New York Democratic Sen. Chuck Schumer, who is considered a key vote on the deal, to oppose it.

The left-leaning Israel advocacy group J Street, which has worked to build support for the deal, is expected to come to the defense of supporters, including potentially Clinton, though on some issues, the group's members regard her as too hawkish for their tastes.

“For people who speak on these Middle East issues on which we have strong positions, we come to their support and defense on those issues, regardless of party, regardless of candidacy,” said Victor A Kovner, a Democratic donor who chairs J Street’s PAC.

Kovner, like his wife, Sarah Kovner, is backing Clinton, and said he has communicated his support for a deal to the candidate.

“She is familiar with my view, but she has a lot of supporters and advisers on both sides of this question — around the nation, both within the Jewish community and beyond the Jewish community.”

Chelsea Clinton: Meet 3 Young Leaders Who Are Transforming the Health Industry
Chelsea Clinton wrote a piece on Medium highlighting three young 2016 Health Matters Summit participants who are transforming the health industry.

> "At this year's Summit, many of our conversations included and highlighted young industry leaders who are playing a greater role than ever in the discussions and solutions, reflecting a larger trend that has us at the Clinton Foundation excited. Through the Foundation's various initiatives — including the students who gather each year for Clinton Global Initiative University (CGI U) — we have seen, heard and supported young social entrepreneurs drive some of the social sector's most promising efforts to reduce health disparities around the world."

Former CGI U Student discusses Winter Meeting "Invest in Her" Working Group Session
Former CGI U student Samir Goel authored a piece for Mogul on the key takeaways from the CGI Winter Meeting working group session "Invest in Her."

"Last week I had the opportunity to attend the Clinton Global Initiative Winter Meeting and participate in the working session titled "Invest In Her."

"…Coming full-circle: the wage-gap is an extension of the biases that are ingrained from early ages. Women are not worse negotiators than men, they are simply not encouraged to be aggressive or value themselves as highly. Imagine if at age 4 a girl was asked about building legos, at age 12 the economy, and age 18 her dream. Investing in her does not mean creating quotas for jobs and investment, it means believing in HER."

Transforming Cultures and How to Overcome the Gender Gap in STEM

Terri McCullough, director of the Clinton Foundation's No Ceilings initiative, penned an op-ed in Fortune in response to the question "What do you think is the most significant barrier to female leadership?" The piece outlines the gains that girls and women have made in the last twenty years and the gaps that still remain with a particular focus on the gender gap in STEM. The piece was also featured in Fortune's Broadsheet on Monday.

"We know more than ever about the progress women have made, and how far we still have to go. While women's representation in the private sector has improved over the past 20 years, gender inequality still persists at every level. The chasms are especially prevalent in tech, and in areas such as computer science, the gap is actually worsening…Data from No Ceilings: The Full Participation Project at the Clinton Foundation, reveal that while women earn the majority of all undergraduate degrees in the U.S., they earn only 18% of computer science degrees, down from a high of 37% in 1984. A 22-cent gender wage gap persists, and women continue to spend a disproportionate amount of time on unpaid work."

In Case You Missed It:

Forbes highlighted President Clinton's work tackling some of the biggest health issues facing the United States today. The story discusses the 2016 Health Matters Summit and CHMI's work to combat prescription drug abuse, mental health problems and health disparities.

Devex posted a piece about the development sector's growing use of virtual reality media. The piece highlights CGI's virtual reality film, "Inside Impact," including a video interview with the producer of the film.

Finally, an article in the Washington Post reported the Clinton Foundation received a subpoena from State Department investigators last fall. Here are the facts:

- The Clinton Foundation is not the focus of the probe.

- As the story makes clear, the focus of the subpoena is narrow and is not about the important, life-changing work of the Clinton Foundation.

- Numerous charity watchdogs have rated the Foundation highly on its work, management, transparency and accountability. The American Institute of Philanthropy's "Charity Watch" awarded the Clinton Foundation an "A" rating

India, China support trilateral dialogue with US

PTI | Dec 13, 2014, 05.58 PM IST

The idea for a trilateral dialogue involving India, China and the US to deal with major global challenges and ensure better mutual ties was mooted by former Union minister Jairam Ramesh.

NEW DELHI: India and China on Saturday supported the idea of a trilateral dialogue involving them and the US to deal with major global challenges and ensure better mutual ties.

"I agree with the proposal to launch a trilateral talk between China, the US and India. I think it is a good idea. China is open to any dialogue if it produces peace and development. I think it is a very positive idea," Chinese Ambassador Le Yucheng said.

He was replying to a question at an interactive session at the conference on "Shaping the 21st Century: India, the US and China" organized by Bengaluru-based media group Deccan Herald.

Minister of state for external affairs V K Singh also supported the idea, saying such a proposal will enhance cooperation between the three countries which have strong ties bilaterally with each other.

The idea for such a dialogue was mooted by former Union minister Jairam Ramesh while addressing the conference.

Editor of Deccan Herald K N Tilak Kumar said the world today was witnessing a tectonic change with the phenomenal rise of China and the continued prominence of the US.

"Both countries are important to India and each one of the three have high stakes in economic ties with the other two," Kumar said, adding the kind of three-way relationship between them will be important not only to each of them but to the whole world.

India and China supported the idea of a trilateral dialogue involving them and US to deal with major global challenges.

The combined contribution of India, US and China to the global GDP is between 40 and 45 per cent and their population is estimated at 40 per cent of the world.

Singh and Le also agreed that the boundary question should be resolved mutually and peace and tranquility at the border should be maintained.

Listing the commonalities and shared interests, Singh said if "you have a trilateral dialogue, I think it will only further the type of interests (we are) seeking."

In his address, the Chinese ambassador said he was "very optimistic" about the "future" between India and China and underlined the need for ensuring peace on the border before reaching a final solution. MORE MPB VSC RT

The Chinese envoy also talked about the trade imbalance with India and said China was opening up its market for Indian companies in many areas to find a solution to the issue.

Replying to a question on South China Sea dispute, he termed it as a complicated issue but asserted that China's sovereignty over the islands in the area was "undisputed".

"It is very complicated (issue). I think if we develop very good relation and cooperation with (concerned countries) we can find a way out. One thing is clear that China's sovereignty over these islands is undisputed," Le said.

In his address, the envoy said though China was "rising" as a major power, it does not seek "hegemony"

"China will remain a benign power and conduct its foreign policy in a constructive way and we will uphold international justice. We will seek cooperative relations with major powers and India. China is not a destroyer and challenger to world order. It is a contributor," he said.

Earlier, Ramesh strongly advocated an institutionalized mechanism for trilateral dialogue among the three powers to deal with issues like climate change, terrorism, energy security and to stop nuclear proliferation.

Ramesh said such a platform was necessary to ensure that differences on various issue do not result in "needless confrontation" and to ensure cohesion on strategic matters.

Identifying climate change as a major issue, he said no global pact to combat global warming was possible without an understanding among the US, China and India as they account for 45-50 per cent of world's green house gas emissions.

Currently, China accounts for about 29 per cent of green house gas emissions while it is 16 per cent by the US and 6 per cent by India. He also welcomed recent announcement by the US and China to take certain actions.

"Environmentally they may not be the most desirable or optimal actions. But these are politically and economically the most realistic action. I think the onus will be on India now to do something meaningful and substantial," he said.

Ramesh said combating terrorism and stopping nuclear proliferation were the other key issues the three countries should work together.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He said as three nuclear powers with substantial arsenals of "strategic and tactical" nuclear weapons, it was incumbent on the US, China and India to ensure nuclear non-proliferation and eliminate the threat of nuclear terrorism as well as to end weapons of mass destructions.

He said the three countries should also ensure that all the states are made accountable for actions of non-state actors whom they may be supporting tacitly. "All three countries have tremendous interests in ensuring that the sources of terrorism are eliminated."

Do we have the line up of which shows he's doing -- we should be loading up surrogates and friendly hosts to the extent possible with the most challenging questions that the author flat out cannot answer:

1. This is yes or no question - do you have any concrete proof that there was any connection at all between these donations the approval of the sale of this uranium company, which was approved by 9 government agencies?
2. isn't it true that the two agencies that had most control over this decision were Treasury and Defense?

We should have surrogates attack the NY TIMES for writing "thousands" of words when their own story admitted that there was no connection between the donations and the decision to approve the transaction.

Washington Post: Where is the white Southern Republican Bill Clinton on race?

By Jonathan Capehart

While touring the William J. Clinton Presidential Library in Little Rock, you are encouraged to watch a 12-minute film about the life and tenure of the 42nd president of the United States. I watched it last November while there for the 10th anniversary of the library's opening, and I found one section on race to be particularly powerful. Clinton talked about his grandfather's Hope, Ark., store and the role it played in his racial views throughout his campaigns and his presidency.

Growing up in Arkansas in the '50s and '60s shaped my later political views in several ways. First of all, when I was a little boy hanging out in my grandfather's store, I became aware of his commitment to treating everyone the same whether they had money or not and whatever their race was. I was only 10 years old when I realized not everyone shared those ideals. When the Little Rock Central High School crisis broke, every person in Arkansas had to take sides.

I was home in Arkansas, in Hot Springs, listening as Martin Luther King told us of his dream that one day children of former slaves and the children of former slave owners would sit down together at the table of brotherhood. That speech remains the greatest political speech of my lifetime — the clearest clarion call to the more perfect union of America in the 21st century. After I heard it, my commitment to civil rights and equal opportunity for all Americans was deeper than it had ever been and stayed with me for a lifetime.

As I sat in that theater where his words and images collided, it occurred to me that I could not recall a white Southern Republican of presidential prominence — of any prominence, really — speak as candidly about race, the dark days of segregation and the effect it had on his or her conscience and political consciousness.

Perhaps it is because of a reliance on the distasteful but politically successful "Southern strategy" devised in the late 1960s. Even though then-Republican National Committee chairman Ken Mehlman called GOP reliance on the exploitation of white fear and resentment "wrong" in 2005, the impact of that strategy still reverberates today.

Many thought — and I hoped — Haley Barbour would be that person. When the highly regarded former Mississippi governor and former GOP chairman was considering a run for the 2012 presidential nomination, The Post's Karen Tumulty reported then that Barbour was also "considering giving a major speech on" race. Given his blind spot the size of the Confederate flag when it comes to race, what Barbour might have said on the subject would have been fascinating. So potent and dangerous was the issue of race that a longtime friend of Barbour's told Jason Zengerle in a profile for GQ magazine in 2011, "If he hasn't figured out how you overcome it, or pretty well minimize it, in my opinion he won't run." Barbour opted not to run, and with that, the necessity of

There have been opportunities for a white Southern Republican to address race from their perspective. Seven months after Barbour bowed out, then-presidential candidate and Texas Gov. Rick Perry came face-to-face with his “Niggerhead” past. Perry weathered the storm by calling the name associated with his family’s rented ranch “very offensive.” But the episode dredged up other racially problematic instances in Perry’s past. Last month’s revelation andadmission that House Majority Whip Steve Scalise spoke in 2002 to a white supremacist group founded by David Duke is yet another embarrassing episode for a party that knows it must reach out to people of color.

The impending crop of 2016 Republican presidential aspirants doesn’t inspire hope that a white Southern Republican will engage in the race talk I’m looking for. For instance, former Florida governor Jeb Bush, right now considered the front-runner, is the scion of a political family that rose from rarified air in New England, not the bubbling race cauldron of the South.

Now, former Arkansas governor Mike Huckabee, who ditched his Fox News television show Saturday night to consider another White House run, has come close to what I’m looking for. This is despite his brief slide into birtherism in 2011. In his 2008 convention speech for then-nominee Sen. John McCain (Ariz.), Huckabee said, “I grew up at a time and in a place where the civil rights movement was fought. I witnessed firsthand the shameful evil of racism. I saw how ignorance and prejudice caused people to do the unthinkable to people of color not so many years ago.” But his words have the feel of a pitying passive observer rather than someone galvanized to action as his fellow Arkansan, Clinton, was.

What I’m looking for is probably impossible. The questions I asked when Barbour withdrew from the 2012 presidential race still remain. Is there a white Southern Republican willing and able to articulate the fear, frustration and anger filling the racial divide with as much nuance and eloquence as Barack Obama did in his first run for the Democratic nomination in 2008? Is there a white Southern Republican willing and able to give an honest speech on race from his or her perspective that sought to explain, heal and move the party forward?

No doubt, such a speech would be filled with uncomfortable and painful memories that would scratch at the fiber of our country. And I recognize it could be the undoing of the brave person willing to deliver it. But said person would help the Republican Party and the nation take a bold step in breaking “America’s constant curse.”

No two women have played a more pivotal role in expanding human rights across the globe than Eleanor Roosevelt and Hillary Clinton. I wrote about Eleanor Roosevelt's work in an opinion editorial in December. Now, I'd like to highlight Hillary Clinton's role.

The world knows about Hillary's bold pronouncement in 1995 in Beijing that "women's rights are human rights, and human rights are women's rights." But there have been so many other examples.

From elevating women's rights and the Office of Global Women's Issues to negotiating the release of the blind Chinese human rights activist Chen Guangcheng in the midst of our nation's most intense economic negotiations with China, Hillary has, as she wrote in Hard Choices, remained "clear eyed about the world as it is while never losing sight of the world as we want it to be."

In 2011, following the death of Ugandan gay rights activist David Kato, rather than just mourn his death issue a formal rebuke, Hillary decided to take the world stage and confront the issue head on. Speaking before the United Nations Human Rights Council in Geneva, Hillary said, "Like being a woman, like being a racial, religious, tribal, or ethnic minority, being LGBT does not make you less human. And that is why gay rights are human rights, and human rights are gay rights."

Let us hear Hillary's call to "never rest on [our] laurels. Never quit. Never stop working to make the world a better place. That's our unfinished business."

Huffington Post opinion: Peter D. Rosenstein: “Americans will sleep better when Hillary Rodham Clinton is in the White House”

By Peter D. Rosenstein

January 5, 2015, 11:36 a.m. EST

Just think about this report in an AP column by Jill Colvin in the Huffington Post. "It's after 9 p.m. on a Sunday night in late November and New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie is deep into a conference call, talking about nuclear weapons and Iran. One voice is advocating a hard line, arguing against allowing Iran any capability to enrich uranium. Another summarizes the status of current negotiations and argues that forcing Iran to give up enrichment entirely isn't realistic." "Late at night, away from the spotlight of the midterm elections and 2016 speculation, he's been on the phone with some of the brightest foreign policy minds in the Republican Party, getting ready to run for president." So Christie who knows nothing about the world situation is now preparing as he would for a college debate or a final exam. Definitely not a report to inspire confidence in the electorate he could lead the only superpower left in the world.

But none of the other potential Republican choices would make anyone feel safer with their finger on the nuclear button. There is former Texas Governor Rick Perry, the candidate for those who thought George W. Bush was too cerebral; Jeb Bush, yes he could call his brother George for advice but remember where that go us; Rick Santorum, enough said; Marco Rubio who believes the last 50 years of sanctions against Cuba accomplished something and should be continued; Rand Paul who would call his father for advice and just turn away from the rest of the world; or Carly Fiorina making her own noise about running. This being the same Fiorina who got dumped by Hewett-Packard (HP) because she couldn't get along with her board after firing 18,000 employees. Her claim to fame was walking away with a golden parachute worth $21 million (a company saves a lot when you fire 18,000 people). She ran and lost a California Senate race to Barbara Boxer which came as no surprise since voters are pretty smart and she ran on her expert business acumen and how she could create jobs.

We live in a world in which a new crisis arises every day and our President is required to respond. We are bringing to a close America's longest war but will still have 13,000 American troops in Afghanistan; ISIS is threatening to overrun Iraq and pull us back to fight there; and Putin is still flexing his muscles even though they are weaker since the price of oil plummeted to $50 a gallon. The Israeli/Palestinian situation is always on the verge of erupting into war and North Korea continues to threaten havoc. There are hotspots around the globe ready to explode at any time.

Americans must ask themselves are we going to elect a President with no real foreign affairs knowledge or experience or are we going to elect the most qualified person ever to run for the office. Are we going to elect someone who is studying up for a debate or will we elect Hillary Rodham Clinton who has the world's leaders on speed-dial because she has traveled the world as Secretary of State negotiating with them and earning their respect?

They know and we know what she stands for. We can be confident that as President she understands and won't back away from the challenges the United States faces. Hillary understands as the only remaining superpower we can't allow the new isolationists in our country to keep the United States from acting to protect our homeland and make this a safer world. She has defined what she means by acting when she describes her view of "Smart Power." She makes clear it is not always rushing in with troops rather using all the levers a President has at her disposal with military action being the last resort. Americans will always sleep better knowing we have a President with an in-depth understanding of the world situation and the players in it.

Barack Obama brought the country out of the worst recession we have seen since the Great Depression. His administration has overseen the creation of more net jobs than the administrations' of both Bushes together and seen the unemployment rate go down from over ten percent to less than six percent. He saved the automotive industry and for the first time in decades we are seeing a rise in manufacturing jobs.

But the work of rebuilding our economy is far from over and it won't be accomplished until people once again have the chance to enter the middle class and see a better future for their families and their children's children. While we are moving in that direction Hillary Rodham Clinton has a record that shows she understands what still has to be done. She will lead a government working to ensure equality for all and providing every person with the tools they need to succeed.

Americans and peace loving people across the globe will all sleep better if Hillary Rodham Clinton takes the oath of office on January 20, 2017.

Wall Street Journal: "Clintons to Attend Mario Cuomo Funeral"

By Erica Orden

January 5, 2015, 1:11 p.m. EST

[Subtitle:] Biden, Christie Among Those At Wake as Last Respects Paid to Liberal Champion

Former President Bill Clinton and former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton are set to attend the funeral of former New York Gov. Mario Cuomo on Tuesday, according to spokesmen, while Vice President Joe Biden and New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie are among political dignitaries expected to join friends and family Monday at the wake.

During his presidency, Mr. Clinton considered Mr. Cuomo as a Supreme Court nominee, but Mr. Cuomo said he wasn't interested.

Mr. Cuomo, the father of current New York Gov. Andrew Cuomo, died Thursday at age 82, in his home in Manhattan, after suffering from a heart condition for many months.

He will be mourned at a wake at the Frank E. Campbell Funeral Home from 1 p.m. to 10 p.m.

Mario Cuomo served three terms as governor, rising to prominence with soaring speeches that defended liberalism during the ascendance of President Ronald Reagan's conservatism in the 1980s. He considered running for president in 1991, drawing national attention for months, but ultimately declined.

On Saturday, his son Andrew spoke for the first time publicly about his father's death, saying "there is a hole in my heart that I fear is going to be there forever."

“We’re going to have his wake and his funeral, but I can say I miss him already,” the governor said, speaking outside a wake being held for New York City police Officer Wenjian Liu, who along with a fellow police officer was fatally shot on Dec. 20.

Mr. Cuomo’s Catholic funeral Mass is scheduled for Tuesday at 11 a.m., at St. Ignatius Loyola Church, on the Upper East Side.

New York Daily News: “Bill and Hillary Clinton to attend former Gov. Mario Cuomo's funeral Tuesday ”

By Annie Karni and Celeste Katz

January 5, 2015, 1:12 p.m. EST

Former President Bill Clinton and ex-Secretary of State Hillary Clinton will join mourners at Tuesday's funeral service for liberal lion Mario Cuomo.

The former three-term governor, 82, passed away last Thursday afternoon of heart failure.

"Mario’s life was the very embodiment of the American dream," the Clintons said in a joint statement after Cuomo's death.

The Clintons and Cuomos have longstanding political and personal bonds.

"When he placed my name in nomination at the 1992 Democratic Convention, he said government had 'the solemn obligation to create opportunity for all our people,'" the Clintons' statement on Cuomo's demise continued. "In his three terms as governor of New York, he honored that obligation.”

The list of speakers at the elder Cuomo's funeral has not yet been established, according to Gov. Andrew Cuomo's office.

Cuomo's funeral service will be held at 11 a.m. Tuesday at St. Ignatius Loyola Church on Park Avenue in Manhattan.

Vice President Biden and his wife, Jill, are among those attending Cuomo's wake Monday at the Frank E. Campbell Funeral Home.

Viewing hours are from 1 to 5 p.m. and from 7 to 10 p.m.

U.S. News & World Report: “A Resolution for the Contenders”

By Charles Wheelan

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

January 5, 2014, 12:00 p.m. EST

[Subtitle:] The only thing Jeb Bush and Hillary Clinton should fear is running a lousy campaign.

Now is a good time for New Year's resolutions. Even if most of us fail to live up to our January goals, there is value in our aspirations. (I plan to finish a book manuscript, lose five pounds and spend more time practicing my putting.)

More interesting, here is my resolution for former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush and ex-Secretary of State Hillary Clinton: Run for president, and do it like you are not afraid to lose. This is the political equivalent of dancing like no one is watching. People who are afraid to lose don't often win – not in sports, not in business, not even in the arts. Fear of losing precludes the risks that typically define major success. If you set out to make a film that will not lose money at the box office, you will end up with "Horrible Bosses 2," not "Citizen Kane."

Both Bush and Clinton have a lot in common with Mitt Romney, in a good way. They are smart, thoughtful, experienced, politically savvy and altruistic. But if they run the kind of campaigns that Romney ran in 2008 and 2012, both risk losing in the same insipid, humiliating way. More important, neither would win a mandate to govern America the way we need right now.

So what does a "run like you're not afraid to lose" campaign look like?

Step One: Survey your life and take account of how good your things would be if you were not elected president in 2016: children, grandchildren, travel, myriad opportunities to make money and do good – all without serious media intrusion.

Step Two: Plan your 2016 campaign recognizing that everything I've described above is the good stuff that happens if you lose. And it's really, really good. You shouldn't fear running a good campaign and losing. The worst-case scenario is running a lousy campaign – pandering to interest groups, saying stupid things in the primaries, dodging important questions – and still losing. Don't pull a Romney. Instead, say things that will change your respective parties and improve our national discourse. Talk about issues in ways that would make it easier to govern if you were to win. Don't tell us that we can lose weight by eating ice cream. Tell us that we can lose weight by exercising more and eating less. Then, should you find yourself in the Oval Office, we will not be shocked when your weight reduction bill includes things that make us sweat.

Voters say they like to hear hard truths like that, but we don't. We're suckers for people with good hair who tell us that tax cuts will generate higher government revenues, or that universal health care will pay for itself through new savings, or that climate change isn't really a problem, or that some international crisis (Syria, Afghanistan or the Israel-Palestine conflict) could be solved if only President Barack Obama were not so feckless/incompetent/political. None of these things is true. Some are Republican shibboleths; some are Democratic ones. If you listen to political talking heads long enough, you'll hear all of them. Each one is like telling people they can lose weight by eating ice cream. Not only is it bogus, but it renders the real solutions less attractive and therefore less likely to happen.

Instead, tell us that climate change is a real threat and that raising the cost of carbon-emitting fuels is the only sensible way to deal with that threat. Tell us that the U.S. is on an unsustainable fiscal path and that any economically and politically viable fix will require both significant changes to our entitlement programs and new revenues. Tell us that you're not sure what to do in Syria but that you understand the scale of the human crisis and the dangers that such instability poses to the U.S. (Okay, maybe it's not Syria, but just tell us that you're not sure about something. Anything.)

Remind yourself that primary voters – the die-hard Democrats and Republicans that your consultants and fundraisers are now telling you how to reach – are not only unrepresentative of America but fundamentally out of sync with everything that has to be done should you reach the White House. If the party stalwarts cheer excitedly for something in Iowa or New Hampshire, there is a darn good chance Congress will never pass it.

Typical candidates say and do whatever it takes to win the primaries. Then they do the same thing in the general election. Finally, having made all the requisite fibs and promises, they try to govern (while still looking over their shoulder at the primary voters who will be important for re-election).

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Jeb and Hillary: You are starting from a strong enough position that you have the potential to turn the whole campaign process on its head. First, identify what you would like to do as president. What really has to happen? What accomplishments would justify taking on this horrible job? Then use the campaign to build a coalition to support those changes. If you win, you will have a mandate to change America's trajectory for the better. If you lose, see No. 1 above. Tell yourself: Gosh darn it, I'm going to be a transformative leader or lose trying.

Is this naive? Of course it is. That's the point of New Year's resolutions. (When I belonged to a health club in Chicago, I was always relieved in early February when the parking lot was no longer crowded.)

Still, I'm reminded of the late Paul Tsongas, the former Massachusetts senator who made a quixotic bid for president in 1992. I covered his campaign as a young journalist. At one point, I asked Tsongas if he really thought he could win. He replied, "I don't have to win. I just have to run a race that my grandchildren will be proud of."

It's a great answer, even for candidates who have a very good chance of winning.

Associated Press: "A Year Before 2016, Iowa Full of Presidential Hopefuls"

By Thomas Beaumont

January 5, 2015, 12:36 p.m. EST

ALTOONA, Iowa (AP) -- Soft laughter rippled through the audience in an Iowa church meeting room when a woman punctuated her question to the keynote speaker, Bernie Sanders, with, "when you're president."

The reaction was a gentle acknowledgment that the Vermont senator, whose self-described socialist positions appeal to the hardest-core liberals, is a long shot for the Oval Office.

Yet while Democrats and Republicans are waiting for Hillary Rodham Clinton, Jeb Bush and other major prospects to formally kick off the 2016 race in the state with the first presidential caucuses, other lesser known or more unlikely aspirants are already active in Iowa, letting everyone know they're available.

They're following a long-established ritual, based on the notion that even far-fetched dreams can come true in a place where friendly people will come out to hear candidates and the media is ever alert for political tremors.

Along with Sanders, former Virginia Sen. Jim Webb and Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley among Democrats, and neurosurgeon Ben Carson, a Republican, are among the non-short-listers making contacts in the state, giving speeches and road-testing their messages.

Most don't actually say they're running. They're just saying hello.

"I don't know if it's an advantage as much as it is laying down a marker, starting to bend the arc of the conversation," said Sue Dvorsky, former Iowa Democratic Party Chairwoman.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And this being campaign-steeped Iowa, most seem to draw an audience.

On a two-day mid-December trip, Sanders, who is among the Senate's most liberal members, made a series of stops in which he touted expanding government regulation of banking, universal government-funded health care and a $15-per-hour minimum wage. Sanders is one of only two senators who don't identify as Democrat or Republican, though he caucuses and votes with Senate Democrats.

Sanders, hunched over a hotel ballroom podium with his tussled shock of white hair, declared that it's time to break up the nation's big banks.

"If Teddy Roosevelt were alive today, he would say, and we should say, if these guys are too big to fail, they are too big to exist," Sanders said.

Sanders' populist pitch bears some resemblance to that of Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren, the rising star of the Democratic left. But she has said she won't run for president, leaving room for Sanders to hope.

Ron Rosenblatt, a financial services company owner, cheered Sanders along with about 150 invited Democrats in the Altoona hotel ballroom. "I like his ability to generate enthusiasm," he said, but at 73, "he's at an age that would make it difficult."

O'Malley, known for defending gay marriage and repealing the death penalty, visited Iowa four times last year and contributed more than $45,000 to Iowa candidates and party organizations, which made him friends in convenient places. Governors often make good presidential candidates, and O'Malley, 51, would be one of the few in the Democratic field, fitting somewhere to Clinton's left on the political spectrum.

Webb, a former secretary of the Navy, visited in September before announcing his plans to explore a candidacy in November. He would slot to Clinton's right.

Clinton visited Iowa twice in 2014 to campaign for Iowa Democrats, but has sent few public signals about her plans, even though most expect her to run.

Although national polls 13 months before the Iowa caucuses reflect mostly name familiarity, about 60 percent of likely Democratic primary voters say they would vote for Clinton. Sanders, O'Malley and Webb combine for less than 10 percent.

Long shot Republicans have also been busy in Iowa, along with the better known names such as New Jersey's Chris Christie and 2012 Iowa caucuses winner Rick Santorum, a former Pennsylvania senator. Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal has stepped up his Iowa travel, as has former Texas Gov. Rick Perry.

Newcomer Carson, 63, a retired Johns Hopkins neurosurgeon who was raised in inner city Detroit, has impressed crowds of curious Republicans on his two trips. Carson, who is African American, ignited curiosity among conservatives after he criticized political correctness, the federal debt and the health care overhaul during the 2013 National Prayer Breakfast, with President Barack Obama in attendance.

While Carson isn't well known, other little candidates wound up eventually getting attention here in 2008, such as businessman Herman Cain, before eventually falling.

Providing hope to all longshots are Mike Huckabee, the former Arkansas governor, who won the 2008 Republican caucuses, and former Vermont Gov. Howard Dean, who came from nowhere in 2004 to challenge eventual Democratic nominee John Kerry.

But for every Huckabee, said former GOP chairman Matt Strawn, "There is a Tommy Thompson, Tom Tancredo or Chris Dodd," referring to Iowa competitors who never broke through.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Physician Christi Taylor of Waukee, who heard one of Carson's talks, said she was "blown away" by his remarks about personal responsibility.

Now she's part of an effort to draft Carson to run. "As someone who likes to evaluate facts, I want to pick the right person, not who has the biggest name in lights," Taylor said.

CNN: "Why U.S. needs to stay in Afghanistan"

By Peter Bergen

January 5, 2015, 8:04 a.m. EST

President Barack Obama says that the last American troops will leave Afghanistan at the end of 2016. This happens to roughly coincide with the end of his second term in office and also fulfills his campaign promise to wind down America's post-9/11 wars.

But is it a wise policy?

Short answer: Of course not.

One only has to look at the debacle that has unfolded in Iraq after the withdrawal of US troops at the end of 2011 to have a sneak preview of what could take place in an Afghanistan without some kind of residual American presence. Without U.S. forces in the country, there is a strong possibility Afghanistan could host a reinvigorated Taliban allied to a reinvigorated al Qaeda.

Needless to say, this would be a disaster for Afghanistan. But it would also be quite damaging to U.S. interests to have some kind of resurgent al Qaeda in the country where the group trained the hijackers for the 9/11 attacks.

It would also be disastrous for the Democratic Party, should it win the presidency in 2016, to be the party that "lost" Afghanistan. After all, the Democratic Party is viewed by some as weaker on national security than the Republicans and it is inevitable that without some kind of residual American presence in Afghanistan al Qaeda would gain sufficient strength to launch an attack from the Afghan-Pakistan border region against American interests.

An easy way for potential Democratic Party presidential candidates such as Hillary Clinton to distinguish their national security policies from Obama's would be to say that they are in favor of some kind of long-term U.S. military presence in Afghanistan and to argue that it would be needed to avoid an Iraq-style outcome there.

Similarly, as the Republican Party starts ramping up for the 2016 campaign, potential candidates such as Jeb Bush can distinguish themselves from the isolationist Rand Paul wing of the party by saying that they are committed to a long-term presence in Afghanistan.

This U.S. military presence in Afghanistan doesn't have to be a large, nor does it need to play a combat role, but U.S. troops should remain in Afghanistan to advise the Afghan army and provide intelligence support.

Such a long-term commitment of several thousand American troops is exactly the kind of force that the Obama administration was forced to deploy to Iraq during the past six months following ISIS's lightning advances.

Selling such a long-term U.S. military presence in Afghanistan would be pushing against an open door with that nation's government. Consider that within 24 hours of being installed, the new Afghan government signed the basing agreement that allows American troops to stay in Afghanistan until December 2016.

Consider also that the Afghan government has already negotiated a strategic partnership agreement with the United States lasting until 2024 that would provide the framework for a longer term U.S. military presence. Consider also that many Afghans see a relatively small, but long-term international troop presence as a guarantor of their stability.

It is also not in Pakistan's interests for Afghanistan to fall to the Taliban or be thrust into another civil war. The Pakistanis have seen for themselves repeatedly the folly of allowing the Taliban to flourish on their own soil, most recently in the Taliban attack last month on the army school in Peshawar that killed 132 children.

It is in Pakistan's own interest that the Afghan army is able to fight effectively against the Taliban, which is more likely if they continue to have American advisers at their side.

Other regional powers such as the Chinese worry about Chinese Uighur separatists establishing themselves on Afghan soil.The Russians are similarly worried about Islamist terrorist groups located in Afghanistan and so will not stand in the way of a small long-term U.S. military presence in Afghanistan as that would dovetail with their own security concerns about the country.

Keeping a relatively small, predominantly U.S. Special Forces, presence in Afghanistan to continue to train the Afghan army past December 2016 is a wise policy that would benefit both Afghans and Americans.

Both the Democratic and Republican parties should adopt such a plan in their platforms as they gear up for the 2016 campaign.

Washington Free Beacon: “Chuck Todd: Hillary Clinton Is a Similar Politician to Obama, Not Like Her Husband”

January 5, 2015, 8:54 a.m. EST

Meet the Press host Chuck Todd says that Hillary Clinton’s political style is close to that of President Obama and unlike that of her Husband, former president Bill Clinton.

When asked about Hillary Clinton’s relationship with Obama, Todd said, “I think a lot better than people realize. I have the impression that they are more alike as politicians than for instance hillary and bill are.”

Promoting his new book on C-SPAN’s Book TV, Todd said unlike former Presidents Clinton and George W. Bush, Hillary Clinton and Obama both weren't born with political instincts.

Hillary and Obama "both have come to politics on the campaign side of it, the theatric side of it," Todd said. "They've both had to learn it–it's not instinctual to them."

Todd's analysis fits with the belief that Hillary Clinton would essentially be a third Obama term to keep his policies intact.

National Journal: "Many Iowa Democratic Leaders Want Contested Caucuses"

By Adam Wollner

January 5, 2015

"Iowa Democratic leaders say they are troubled by the prospect that" former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton (D) "could win the state's 2016 presidential caucuses without a serious challenge, a view primarily rooted in a desire for a more liberal candidate or at least a robust debate about the party's policies and direction ... Many county officials said they would like to see" Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-MA) and Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-VT) run. "State Democratic officials also want a contested race because that boosts the party apparatus and fundraising." (Wall Street Journal)

With Hillary Rodham Clinton's 2016 presidential run looking like a foregone conclusion, the question now is whether she has a message.

Fresh off a visit to Iowa and two events last week in Washington where she sought to reconnect with female voters, Clinton has sounded increasingly like a candidate. She hints at her presidential ambitions with wink-and-a-nod asides like the one in Iowa: "It is true, I'm thinking about it."

Yet in framing what she described Friday as her "long career of fighting for women, and children, and fairness, and equality, and justice," Clinton has nearly mastered the art of avoiding controversy, offering dry speeches and a pitch that seems intended to be inoffensive.

Rather than staking out attention-grabbing positions or wading into policy debates, Clinton seems focused on humanizing an image that has suffered in the past from accusations of brittleness. She rarely misses an opportunity to suggest that her soon-to-arrive grandchild is inspiring her to take another look at politics.

"I've been thinking a lot about family, because, you know, I'm on grandbaby watch," she wryly told a mostly female audience at a Democratic conference Friday.

"We will certainly do everything possible to prepare this child, protect this child. But I want that for everybody's child, and everybody's grandchild." Pivoting into what began to sound like a campaign speech, she added: "I want every one of our children to feel that they are inheriting the best of America ... that this country is on your side; that this country will give you the fighting chance, the fair shot you deserve."

Those sorts of gauzy statements have become Clinton's hallmark this year.

The former secretary of State has said little, for example, about the president's controversial strategy for defeating Islamic State militants in Iraq and Syria — or where she might draw the line on the mission of U.S. troops, a fraught issue after her Senate vote authorizing the use of force in Iraq in October 2002 complicated her last presidential campaign.

Her recent speech on energy policy avoided hot-button topics like the Keystone pipeline and was largely devoid of any new policy prescriptions: "Good ideas are everywhere you look," she said in one typical line. "Imagine what we can do as a country if we all roll up our sleeves and get to work."

When confronted by an activist on the rope line in Iowa about whether she agreed with President Obama's decision to delay until after the election his promised executive action on immigration, she deliberately sidestepped the issue before moving on: "I think we need to elect more Democrats," she crisply told the young woman, who identified herself to Clinton as "a Dreamer," brought to the U.S. illegally as a child.

So far, Clinton's lack of specificity has made it difficult to discern what distinct argument she would make for her candidacy. A potential rival from the left, Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren, who recently published her book "A Fighting Chance," cuts a sharp contrast with Clinton in that sense — she is succinct as she rails against banks and Wall Street for "cheating families."

Warren, who so far has insisted she will not run for president, brought cheering activists to their feet in Detroit this summer with an impassioned, populist speech declaring that "the game is rigged" against working Americans: "If we push back against the biggest, strongest, most ruthless lobbying effort in the country," Warren said of big banks, "if we push back hard, we can win."

Clinton drew a more muted response with her somewhat meandering speech at Iowa Sen. Tom Harkin's annual steak fry last weekend, which seemed to pull threads from her husband's presidential campaigns in 1992 and 1996 — dusting off his signature line about championing Americans who "work hard and play by the rules," and worry that their children will be worse off than they were.

The one area where Clinton has been most visibly passionate — throughout her career and now as she ponders another bid to be the first woman president — has been her advocacy for the rights of women and girls around the world. That subject will be showcased at the Clinton Global Initiative gathering, which begins Sunday night in New York.

When she was introduced this week by Harkin and Democratic National Committee Chairwoman Debbie Wassermann Schultz, both recalled Clinton's groundbreaking 1995 speech at a women's conference in Beijing, in which she declared, "Let it be that human rights are women's rights, and women's rights are human rights, once and for all."

Clinton closed her 2008 presidential candidacy with a concession speech that played on her historic effort, saying that although she and her team "weren't able to shatter that highest, hardest glass ceiling this time… it's got about 18 million cracks in it."

As a potential reprise nears, Clinton seems to be attempting to expand that mantra from breaking barriers herself to her desire to create greater security for the middle class through initiatives such as raising the minimum wage, expanding access to childcare and ensuring that women and men are paid equally.

"We talk about a glass ceiling," she said during a panel Thursday at the Center for American Progress. "These women don't even have a secure floor under them."

By the next day, at the Democratic gathering in Washington, she had sharpened the line: "No wonder so many families are hurting today. For too many women, for too many families, they don't just face ceilings on their dreams — it feels to them as though the floor has collapsed beneath their feet."

"These aren't just women's issues, they are family issues," she added. "They are American issues, and they hold back our entire economy."

It seemed to be the seed of a 2016 message.

The Hill: "Five key Hillary Clinton players to watch"

By Amie Parnes

September 21, 2014, 7:00 a.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton is known for having perhaps the most loyal inner circle in politics, sometimes loyal to a fault.

With the speculation of another Clinton bid for the presidency rising to a boil, The Hill looks at five insiders who promise to play a big role in the would-be campaign.

Cheryl Mills

Perhaps the most trusted aide in Hillaryland, Mills served as chief of staff and counselor during Clinton's tenure at the State Department, handling everything from personnel matters to management and operations at Foggy Bottom.

The Stanford University Law graduate is close to both Clintons, having defended the former president during his impeachment trial and remaining close in recent years. But more than anything, Mills is known as a straight shooter, something the former first couple values.

Those familiar with the Clinton operation say that if there's anyone who get the wheels greased in the lead-up to a potential presidential bid for Clinton, it will be Mills.

"She holds the keys the castle," one former Hillary aide said. "If there's one singular go-to for the Secretary, she's the one."

Minyon Moore

A senior adviser to Hillary Clinton during her 2008 run, expect Moore to play an even bigger role in a second campaign.

While she now works as a strategist at Dewey Square Group in Washington, she has a constant and direct line of communication with the former secretary of State on both professional and personal matters.

Like Mills, Moore also has long-running ties to the former first couple. She served in the Clinton White House as assistant to the President and director of White House Office of Political Affairs as well as the White House public liaison director.

Moore doesn't have an outsized personality, and prefers to stay behind the scenes more often than not. But those inside the operation say Moore would have a role in piecing together the initial phases of a campaign.

"In terms of inner circle, Minyon easily falls into that pot," a second former Hillary aide said. "She's always been fiercely loyal to both the president and the secretary. And I wouldn't expect that to change ever."

Jake Sullivan

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A relative newcomer to Hillaryland in 2007, Sullivan helped Clinton prepare for the Democratic primary debates, serving as an adviser for all-things policy.

But when she entered the State Department, the Minnesota native became her all-purpose senior aide where he not only ran Clinton's Policy and Planning shop, but also dealt with communications and personnel issues.

When Clinton traveled to 112 countries as Secretary of State, Sullivan was constantly at her side. So it only made sense that when Clinton left Foggy Bottom, he was instantly snatched up by the White House, where he served as Vice President Biden's national security adviser.

Sullivan left the White House recently to teach at Yale Law School this fall. But, Clinton insiders expect him to return if a Clinton campaign begins.

Hillary Clinton thinks Sullivan has chops for his own White House run one day, as she told a crowd in 2012.

"I told my husband about this incredibly bright rising star — Rhodes Scholar, Yale Law School — and my husband said, 'Well, if he ever learns to play the saxophone, watch out,'" she said.

Maura Pally

When Hillary Clinton officially joined the Clinton Foundation in 2013, one of her first hires was Pally, who would serve as the executive director for her office at the Clinton Foundation.

Since then, Pally has run many of Clinton's initiatives and projects including 'No Ceilings,' focused on Women and Girls, and Too Small to Fail, an initiative helping the health of young children.

Pally, like other Hillarylanders, began in the Clinton White House serving as a special assistant in the counsel's office. She would go on to serve as deputy counsel during Hillary's 2008 presidential run.

"She is probably one of the most capable people on staff," said one Clinton insider. "There is nothing Maura can't do. I think the secretary is well aware of that."

Dan Schwerin

Among the youngest staffers on Team Clinton, Schwerin, an early thirty-something, got his start in Hillary's Senate office, serving as a press aide.

He went on to work on the 2008 presidential campaign before landing at the State Department as a speechwriter to Clinton.

But Schwerin, who has inarguably spent more time with Clinton than any other aide this year, had perhaps his biggest task ahead of him when he helped Clinton pen her tome Hard Choices, which was released earlier this summer.

Clinton insiders expect that will be just the beginning of Schwerin's trajectory up the Clinton ladder.

The Hill blog: Ballot Box: "Harkin: 2016 'weighing heavily' on Hillary"

By Scott Wong

September 20, 2014, 12:48 p.m. EDT

Retiring Sen. Tom Harkin doesn't know if Hillary Clinton will run for president in 2016.

The Iowa Democrat said the decision is "weighing heavily" on Clinton, who has "more chapters" to write in her book.

His remarks Friday during an interview with Iowa Public Television, come nearly a week after Bill and Hillary Clinton headlined his final steak fry in Indianola, Iowa, fueling presidential talk in the first-in-the-nation caucus state.

Before taking the stage at the event — Harkin, who's spent nearly 40 years in Congress, — said Hillary's eyes lit up when she watched him play with his grandchildren. The longtime senator asked Clinton, a soon-to-be grandmother, to take a photograph with his entire clan in a shed at the annual event.

"And she just wistfully said to me, 'It just looks so wonderful,' she said, 'because now I'm going to have grandchildren,'" Harkin explained.

"And I've got to think it weighs heavy," he continued. "I mean, she has been first lady of Arkansas, first lady of the United States, U.S. senator, secretary of State, that's a lot of public service. And if you're going to run for President that's a ten year commitment."

Harkin, who lost to Bill Clinton in the 1992 Democratic presidential primary, said he doesn't believe Hillary has already decided to run.

"People say, 'Oh, she has already made the decision.' I don't think so," Harkin said. "I think this is weighing heavily on her. I wouldn't be surprised if she went one way or the other."

Bill and Hillary Clinton's only daughter, Chelsea, announced her pregnancy last spring and is due to give birth sometime in the fall.

CBS News: "Rand Paul not waiting for 2016 to take on Hillary Clinton"

By Rebecca Kaplan

September 21, 2014, 10:16 a.m. EDT

Sen. Rand Paul, R-Kentucky, isn't waiting until the 2016 election to formally kick off to start tearing into Hillary Clinton, the most prominent face among Democrats who might seek the nomination.

Referencing a 2008 primary ad in which Clinton suggested then-candidate Barack Obama will not prepared to handle a major overnight crisis as president, Paul suggested the former secretary of state had proven herself incapable of doing so either.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I think she had a 3 a.m. moment. She didn't answer the phone, and I think it absolutely should preclude her from being [president]," he said at the California Republican convention, where he was speaking Saturday, according to the L.A. Times. Paul had just described Clinton's actions in the lead up to the 2012 attack on the U.S. diplomatic facility in Benghazi, Libya, which Paul offered as proof of her failure.

Paul also lit into President Obama, an unsurprising choice of target given the president's low approval ratings which threatens to drag down Democrats during the midterm elections.

The Kentucky Republican pointed to the Affordable Care Act and Mr. Obama's initial plans to take unilateral action on immigration (which was ultimately delayed until after the November elections) to argue that he was running roughshod over the Constitution.

"It is a terrible tragedy, it is a danger to us as a country, and we need to do everything we can to stop him from abusing our laws," Paul said. Later, he added, "We have a president who basically has created a lawless atmosphere in Washington."

Though the midterm elections are less than two months away, Paul did not use the speech to fire up California Republicans about this year's candidates. Instead he focused mostly on laying out his own priorities for the GOP.

"When our party looks like America -- with earrings and without earrings, with ponytails and without ponytails, with tattoos and without tattoos -- when we look like the rest of America -- white, black, brown -- we're going to win again," Paul said as he argued that his party needs to expand its appeal to win in places like California again after decades of losing. "We've got to go out and we've got to broaden our party, and when we do, we'll be a national party again. We will win again."

Hindustan Times: "Eye on future? Modi to meet Hillary and Bill Clinton in New York"

By Yashwant Raj

September 21, 2014, 18:22 IST

Among Prime Minister Narendra Modi's many meetings during his coming visit to the US, the one with the most profound implications for the future will be with the Clintons.

Modi will meet former president Bill Clinton and his wife Hillary Clinton, the former secretary of state, who is expected to run for the White House in 2016, and win, according to polls.

They are scheduled to meet in New York, where Modi will be from September 26 to 29 for the UN general assembly. And the Clintons live in Chappaqua, near New York city.

No other details were available of the meeting except, according to multiple sources in New York and New Delhi, that the prime ministe will receive the couple in his hotel.

From all accounts, Modi has never met either of the Clintons before, despite the fact that they travel to India frequently — Hillary Clinton was there just this past July.

So was the former president, separately, in connection with a project run by his foundation in Jaipur. He has been a regular, since his first visit as president in 2000.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And they have both said they have been impressed by Modi, for their own reasons. The former president, who is something of a policy wonk, liked the prime minister's economic policies.

And the former secretary of state has said she was impressed — no prizes for guessing — by Modi's foreign policy savvy in inviting SAARC leaders to his inauguration.

To put their meeting in perspective, Modi doesn't have any other past presidents on his schedule — and there are three, George H Bush, Jimmy Carter and George W Bush — so far.

But he is certainly meeting another Presidential hopeful, vice president Joe Biden, who is hosting a state lunch for the visiting prime minister in Washington DC.

It couldn't be confirmed if the prime minister was meeting any of the Republicans contemplating a run for the White House — it's a crowded and unclear field right now.

In September 2000, Prime Minister Atal Bihari Vajpayee, who was in New York for the UN general assembly, spoke with then Republican candidate George W Bush over phone.

The meeting with the Clintons will be special thus.

President Clinton is widely credited with setting the foundation for new relations between the two countries, which were largely on opposite sides during much of the Cold War.

He intervened during the Kargil War by forcing Pakistan to back off, and followed it up with a successful visit to India in 2000, with a rockstar reception in Parliament.

But key to this meeting, said sources, will be Secretary Clinton, who has not announced she is running, but she will most likely, according to her supporters, rivals and most political hacks.

They felt further convinced recently when she and her husband attended a Democratic party event in Iowa, where Barack Obama beat her in the 2008 primaries and turned the race.

CNN: "Bill Clinton on Fareed Zakaria GPS"

September 21, 2014, 11:10 a.m. EDT

CNN's FAREED ZAKARIA GPS features an interview with Bill Clinton. As former U.S. President Bill Clinton prepares for the 2014 annual meetings of the Clinton Global Initiative in New York City, Fareed Zakaria spoke with him about the recent plans announced by President Barack Obama on the U.S. contributions to the Ebola outbreak in Africa, and what he feels the U.S. should do about the terrorist group ISIS.

TEXT EXCERPT

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton on Syria: “I supported two years ago the proposal that Hillary and Secretary Panetta and then CIA director, General Petraeus, made to give more robust armed support to the Syrians. But I well understood why the president was reluctant to do it because, as you see in Libya, there’s still lots of militia groups there who like America.”

Clinton on the fight against ISIS in Iraq: "the Iraqi government is now more inclusive than it has been since the fall of Saddam Hussein. And that seems to be awakening, if you will, the willingness of the Sunni tribal leaders to participate in fighting. We know the Kurds and the Peshmerga are willing to fight. If we can help them and support them, I think the larger fight against ISIS can continue as it should – as a local struggle for the freedom and liberty of the people"

Clinton on Russian expansion into Ukraine: "President Yeltsin, in return for Ukraine getting rid of all of its nuclear weapons and sending them to Russia, signed an agreement with me and the then president of Ukraine saying that Russia would always respect Ukraine's territorial integrity. President Putin said it was an agreement, not a treaty, therefore I'm not bound by it. I just think it's a bum rap that expanding NATO caused all this. You know, that - you made me invade Georgia and you made me invade Ukraine because they were the only two countries on my border that weren't part of NATO? I mean come on, it just - it's not a credible thing."

A full transcript of the interview is available after the jump.

FULL INTERVIEW TRANSCRIPT

THIS IS A RUSH TRANSCRIPT. THIS COPY MAY NOT BE IN ITS FINAL FORM AND MAY BE UPDATED

FAREED ZAKARIA, HOST, CNN GPS: On Friday, I sat down with Bill Clinton at his offices in Harlem. He's in an interesting place in life. Almost 14 years after leaving the White House, he has settled in to a new way of effecting change around the world. His Clinton Global Initiative will hold its 10th annual meeting next week. The organization claims that in those 10 years they have improved the lives of 430 million people in 180 countries. He's also set to soon become a grandfather. We'll get to all of those matters later in the show, but first I wanted to ask him about the stories that are atop the news.

ZAKARIA: President Clinton thank you so much for joining us.

BILL CLINTON, FORMER PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: Glad to do it.

ZAKARIA: So I've got to ask you about ISIS. I saw you on "The Daily Show" say that you thought we had to respond to these brutal executions of Americans. But I want to press you. Isn't that what ISIS wants? Isn't that –wasn’t the purpose of the executions to bait us?

CLINTON: No. But there's a difference in, for example, using targeted drones and airstrikes as we did against al Qaeda effectively for years to try to take down their leadership and infrastructure and let them know they can't just decapitate people for the cheap thrill of the global media response and horrifying people and get away with it and getting bogged down in the kind of war they would like us to get bogged down in that would cost us a lot of lives and a lot of treasure and inevitably lead to greater civilian casualties, which is why I think the president's strategy has a chance of succeeding, because the Iraqi government is now more inclusive than it has been since the fall of Saddam Hussein and that seems to be awakening, if you will, the willingness of the Sunni tribal leaders to participate in fighting. We know the Kurds and the Peshmerga are willing to fight. If we can help them and support them, I think the larger fight against ISIS can continue as it should as a local struggle for the freedom and liberty of the people.

ZAKARIA: You talked about the Iraq part of the strategy, which strikes - you're right, it's - it's viable. There's an Iraqi Army that could be better - made more effective if there were fewer loyalists and more professional officers in it and more inclusive. There are the Kurdish forces. The Syria part is the real puzzle.

CLINTON: It's much harder.

ZAKARIA: This is fierce civil war in which the stakes are very high. Generally moderates don’t do well in those circumstances. Turks have been trying to stand up moderate Syrians for a long time. How do you think we should handle it?

CLINTON: Well, I support giving the forces that we most closely identify with greater capacity to fight ISIS. The whole question about the Syrian government is really academic, between the Iranians and the Russians and others, they'll give them enough money and military capacity to do what they have to do.

ZAKARIA: So do you think Assad is going to stay?

CLINTON: I don't know. But I think that the worst enemy right now is ISIS. And I don't think we should be in a position of directly coordinating with or cooperating with Assad, but I think we all recognize what would happen if ISIS had like a monster like state that included most of Syria and Iraq. And - but I don't - I think, therefore, that when the president said we'd cooperate with the moderate Syrian forces, they're the only people we have to try to empower there, to do their part in this struggle.

ZAKARIA: Do you agree with the former secretary of State, who said that perhaps if we had helped them three years earlier, it might have been - it might have had or would this - would those funds and arms have ended up with ISIS?

CLINTON: I agree with her and I would have taken the chance. I also agree with her when she said we can't know whether it would have worked or not. And that's why you have to be careful when you make these commitments, because you can't know. But since ISIS has plenty of money, is one of the great bank robbers in human history, among other things, they were going to get their weapons one way or the other. So I would risk it. And besides, when we were talking about doing it, there was no ISIS. However, it was a - an argument she lost within the administration and she admitted then and acknowledged in her book that she can't know that if her recommendation had been followed, it would have worked. That's one of those things you can't know. This - that's why all of these decisions are hard.

ZAKARIA: Next on GPS, much more with Bill Clinton. Russia, Ukraine and the West, and much more.

ZAKARIA: Back now on this special edition of GPS, more of my interview with Bill Clinton.

ZAKARIA: Ukrainian officials - high Ukrainian officials have said that Russia, in effect, invaded Ukraine over the last month, that somewhere between 3,000 and 10,000 Russian soldiers crossed the border. Do you think we should call this an invasion and act in a way, in a sense appropriately?

CLINTON: Well, really, there's no question they invaded Ukraine. And there's no question what Mr. Putin has tried to do. They've also armed the Eastern Ukrainians, as they've done all those things. But I think Ukraine elected a very prudent and strong president. He's trying to negotiate an end to this that enables them to have a relationship with Russia without paralyzing their turn to Europe and their attempt to reap the economic and political benefits that would entail. And I think the United States should support building Ukraine's capacity to defend itself, but even more importantly, we should be doing what we can, including groups like our Global Initiative, to help them succeed economically, to reward their choice to be free and independent. I think it's very important that the world not buy the propaganda that is going over the Russian media that Ukrainians wanted to have an adversarial relationship with Russia. That's simply not true. All they wanted to do was to have a good relationship with Russia and a good relationship with Europe and the West and be a bridge between the two. Why he doesn't want that remains something of a mystery to me. I mean I think he's got an outdated view of how to get more influence and accumulate more wealth. But the - he's in these negotiations now and I think those of us who are outside it should not complicate his job by saying too much until we see what he can negotiate.

ZAKARIA: You know, a lot of Russians, including Mr. Putin, blame you, in a sense. They say NATO expanded, we were told NATO wouldn't expand, they expanded very close to our borders. Then the Clinton administration, intervened in Kosovo, over our objections. So they argue that you pushed out so now don't be surprised that you get a backlash.

CLINTON: If you can find one Polish citizen who agrees, I'll be glad to take that seriously. I mean, look, first of all, I never told them NATO wouldn't expand. I ran for president advocating the expansion of NATO in 1992. And I had a conversation with Boris Yeltsin, whom I respected very much and who was a much better president than he got credit for, as we all now see. And I said, look, I don't think you're going to invade Eastern Europe, but you're not going to be there forever. President Yeltsin, in return for Ukraine getting rid of all of its nuclear weapons and sending them to Russia, signed an agreement with me and the then president of Ukraine saying that Russia would always respect Ukraine's territorial integrity. President Putin said it was an agreement, not a treaty, therefore I'm not bound by it. I just think it's a bum rap that expanding NATO caused all this. You know, that - you made me invade Georgia and you made me invade Ukraine because they were the only two countries on my border that weren't part of NATO? I mean come on, it just - it's not a credible thing

ZAKARIA: Coming up in a moment, more Bill Clinton. If Hillary Clinton were to run and win, what would life be like as the "first man"? I'll ask him to consider.

ZAKARIA: Welcome back to GPS. Here's more of my interview with Bill Clinton, 42nd president of the United States and Founder of the Clinton Foundation. One of the foundation's main projects is the Clinton Global Initiative which brings together world leaders, business leaders, philanthropists and non-profits, to work on solving what it calls "the world's most pressing challenges". Next week, the power-packed group will hold its 10th annual meeting.

ZAKARIA: Let me start with something that really affects The Clinton Foundation and The Clinton Global Initiative. You worked a lot on issues like disease and disease prevention. What lesson do you think we should draw from this outbreak of Ebola and the speed and kind of pace with which its spread? When you look at it, what is it that you - you can tell us about maybe the potential for pandemics or - or anything?

CLINTON: Well, first, like anybody else who's involved, we have a big presence in Liberia and three of our people, our top people, have stayed in Liberia to help organize the response. So we've all got to figure out, you know, how to coordinate it better. We're going to have a special session on it at CGI. But the lesson we should draw, the lessons are twofold. One is we have to do a much better job in building the health care infrastructure in these countries. We have to increase their capacity, including the capacity to have community health workers go out in these villages and have credibility with people. You know, this tragic story of the health workers being killed in Guinea, it's just terrible. But if we have more capacity, we can deal with it quicker. So that's the first thing. The second thing is we're going to have to get quicker and nimbler at developing biomedical responses, you know, the vaccines or whatever or cures. And the third thing is the wealthy countries have got to reexamine how we fund the World Health Organization, because I think they do a marvelous job. But increasingly, as development ministries get more expertise in given areas, they want to fund specific projects in specific countries. And it's clear that the World Health Organization needs a pot of money that can be mobilized in a hurry for emergencies while we wait for the inevitable time delay when America and the U.K. and France and Scandinavia, we all kick in money.

ZAKARIA: I've got to ask you about some politics, are the Democrats going to hold the senate?

CLINTON: I think so, but it's going to be close. And it depends frankly on whether we can continue to match the money provided by all these outside groups. I think the Koch brothers are going to spend about $300 million in the last couple of months. And it depends on who turns out. We have got somehow, sooner or later, to convince the people that vote in presidential elections for our side they have to vote in the Congressional elections. And if they don't, they can't complain when they lose governorships, state legislators and members of Congress and the senators who happen to be up in that year. We've got a lot more senators up this year than the Republicans do. And we have them up in states that President Obama did not carry in 2012. But they're running great campaigns and we seem to be doing reasonably well. But it - if you look at all these polls, which are all over the place, they're all accurate - that is the real question in polling today is the sample you pick based on who you think will vote. And the question - the answer to that is, no one knows. So if we can get our turnout up, we'll be fine and they'll hold the Senate.

ZAKARIA: Along those lines, when I talk to Democratic grassroots activists, the one person who energizes them is Elizabeth Warren. Do you think she's the future of the Democratic Party?

CLINTON: I think she's an important part of it. And I think the American people are - the Democrats, at least - are worried about people having an equal shot at prosperity. And, you know, when I was president, I've told you this before - one of the things I was most proud of is we moved 100 times as many people from poverty into the middle class as moved under President Reagan. The bottom 20 percent (INAUDIBLE) increased 23.6 percent, the top 20 percent increased 20.5 percent. And everybody else in the middle did better than they did in the Reagan years. You had to have more broad-based prosperity. So I think anybody who's arguing for that is going to find a receptive ear in the American electorate, not just among Democrats. I mean we - we're going to have a vote in my native state of Arkansas in raising the minimum wage and I'll be surprised if we don't get a majority of Republicans to vote for it, even though their politicians are, by and large, against it.

ZAKARIA: There are certain circumstances in - in the next presidential election that might produce a very unusual outcome. And I'm wondering have you given any thought to what it would be like to be back in the White House in a different role?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

CLINTON: No. No, I haven't. I think that in general, if you're a spouse, you ought to support. If you're a former president, you ought to do whatever the current president asks you to do, if you can do it in good conscience. But I have given it no thought beyond that. I - this is my life now, this foundation. And I have poured my heart into it for 14 years and this is our tenth annual Clinton Global Initiative. We've raised, you know, $80 billion and helped 400 million people plus in 180 countries. It's my life now. And I do politics at election time if they want me for people I believe in I think I can help. But otherwise, I'm happy doing what I'm doing and if that's what I'm asked to me, I'd be happy as a clam if that were the case, too. I'll do whatever I'm asked to do.

ZAKARIA: And do you have any specific thoughts about being a grandfather?

CLINTON: Yes, I can't wait. And I'm - we're on watch now. I hope by the first of October, I'll be a grandfather. I - I...

ZAKARIA: Do - do you care if it is a boy or a girl?

CLINTON: No. And I don't know.

ZAKARIA: Do you really not know?

CLINTON: No, no. And there are - my daughter and son-in-law decided not to know. They want to be surprised. So we're all just sitting around waiting.

ZAKARIA: Mr. President, we usually have an end segment where I recommend a book of the week. We are blowing it out all for you, so I'm giving you the last word, which is what book would you recommend? You're a voracious reader. You've read stuff. If you were to tell our readers what should they read?

CLINTON: If you'll give me two.

ZAKARIA: Sure.

CLINTON: First, I'd like readers to read "Abundance," the Peter Diamandis book with his coauthor, because if they did that, they would see that while the headlines are really bad in the world today, the trend lines are pretty good. Extreme poverty is down. The health care is improving dramatically around the world. There are developments now which make me believe we might be able to do what we did in the 90s which is to use technological developments to create more jobs than we lose. For the last few months, for the first time in literally more than a decade, 40 percent of the new jobs have been in higher wage categories. I think people should read this and get some good ideas. The other book is "The Social Conquest of Earth" by E.O. Wilson.

ZAKARIA: Yes.

CLINTON: He's a Nobel Prize winning microbiologist, but he writes as best he can from all the known evidence about the history of life on Earth from single-cells organisms to the present day. The reason I would like them to read that is that he said if you look at all the species that have ever lived on Planet Earth, the most successful were ants, termites, bees and people. Why? Because they're the greatest cooperators. And even - and I saw the other day a story about how there are 25,000 species of spiders on Earth and for reasons nobody understands, a couple of dozen of them have started cooperating and they build stronger, better webs. Cooperation will save the future. And America should lead it. Every time humanity has been in danger of extinguishing itself, our consciousness and our conscience have led us to come together. That's the big issue of the 21st century. That's the great fight of the next 25 years.

ZAKARIA: So Congress should learn from spiders, that - that's…

(LAUGHTER)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

CLINTON: They will - I spent a lot of time with spiders in my early life. I just think, you know, the - "The Constitution" could be subtitled, "Let's Make A Deal." The founders understood it. We need to remember it.

ZAKARIA: Bill Clinton, a pleasure to have you on Mr. President.

CLINTON: Thank you.

Associated Press: "2016 May Loom, But Jeb Bush Is Focused on Business"

By Michael J. Mishak and Steve Peoples

September 20, 2014, 10:41 a.m. EDT

CORAL GABLES, Fla. (AP) — While other Republicans considering the 2016 presidential race are openly laying the foundations of potential campaigns, former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush is busy tending to a growing personal business empire.

It's a break in style from recent candidates who distanced themselves from the sometimes politically risky business of making money before running.

A Republican establishment favorite, Bush is chairman of a Florida-based private equity and business advisory group, and is a managing partner of at least eight other separate companies that dabble in ventures ranging from privatized emergency response to real estate to driverless cars, according to state and federal records.

In the past three years, regulatory filings show that he and his partners at the private equity firm, Britton Hill Holdings, have branched out into nearly a dozen different investment entities and raised at least $66.4 million from domestic and foreign investors. That includes several million this past April from a group that included a privately owned Chinese conglomerate, a deal first reported by Bloomberg.

Bush says he will make a decision about 2016 by year's end. Should he run, this son and brother of the past two Republican presidents will face pressure to disclose years of personal tax returns and details about his private business activity, as well as to unwind his ownership in the business network he began building after leaving office in 2007.

For now, in much the same way he is quietly working to support GOP candidates in the November elections, Bush's business deals are made out of the spotlight. There is no suggestion any are improper. Because they are private enterprises and disclosure laws require only basic information, public documents offer few details about their exact nature.

They are, however, reminiscent of the GOP's last presidential nominee, Mitt Romney, who struggled at times to explain the often complicated and sometimes controversial ways he made a living. Romney, as well as Bush's father and brother, wound down personal business affairs years before running for president.

"It is a legitimate issue to think about," said Ron Kaufman, a former Romney adviser who is close to the Bush family. "In a perfect world, would he be better served if (the presidential race) was four years away? Sure. But it's not."

Bush declined a request for an interview.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Those close to him say that after his two terms as governor, he has worked aggressively to improve his personal finances, a common practice for politicians after public service.

Bush "is not currently a candidate for office. He's a businessman," said his spokeswoman, Kristy Campbell. "If he makes a decision to run for president, he would certainly review his work engagements at that time."

Other Bush confidants caution against reading too much into his business dealings. They believe he is well positioned to wait longer than other candidates to make a call on a campaign because of his political connections and deep fundraising network.

"You don't put your life on hold or call a time out. You move on until you make a decision," said Al Cardenas, a Bush friend and adviser. "He enjoys what he's doing. Investors trust him. So why would you put a stop to that?"

Operatives in both parties said the calculus isn't that simple.

In 2012, Romney was attacked by other Republicans as a "vulture capitalist," which helped create the portrait of job-destroying buyout chief who enjoyed a lower tax rate than most people in the United States.

"It is a target-rich environment for opposition research teams to pour through and begin to build a narrative that you're out of touch," said South Carolina-based Republican operative Hogan Gidley. "It sounds like he's doing everything right, everything above board. But the political reality exists that it still might hurt him."

Cardenas rejects the comparison to Romney, whose Bain Capital held a majority stake in dozens of companies and directly oversaw management decisions. Bush, unlike Romney, will not be defined by his "fairly modest" investments, Cardenas said, adding that comparing the two is "the difference between running a gas station and running Texaco."

Friends and former aides say Bush's behavior is consistent with the way he handled his business affairs while contemplating runs for governor in 1994 and 1998.

"Before he was a candidate, he was a businessman, and he conducted his business sort of not thinking about his next (political) move. He just did it," said Phil Handy, a Florida businessman who was chairman of Bush's gubernatorial campaigns. "I think it reflects his ambivalence about running for office, but I don't think it's at all unusual."

Still, at this point in their political careers, Romney and the previous Bush presidents had all but exited the business world.

Bush's father, former President George H. W. Bush, turned his financial affairs over to a blind trust once he became vice president. Jeb Bush's brother, former President George W. Bush, sold stocks with connections to Mideast oil companies roughly a decade before running. He later put the majority of his assets into treasury notes and a blind trust.

Jeb Bush's business obligations sometimes have conflicted with the political calendar.

When some possible contenders, including New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie and Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul, spoke at the Conservative Political Action Conference in Washington this year, Bush declined to appear because of undisclosed business commitments.

But Bush has traveled the country this year raising money for Republicans and continues to work on education issues at his foundation.

He has headlined more than two dozen private fundraisers, including events to help the governors of Iowa, South Carolina and Nevada, three of the first four states to hold presidential primaries. This past week he attended fundraisers for Illinois gubernatorial hopeful Bruce Rauner and Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky.

"He's quietly active. He just doesn't go out and bang the drum," said Mel Sembler, a Florida real estate developer and top Republican fundraiser. "He's doing all the right things, and I think he's going to be a serious contender."

Subject:	Iran statement

HRC has signed off on the statement below and asks if she should tweet as well. Anyone have any concerns?

The understanding that the major world powers have reached with Iran is an important step toward a comprehensive agreement that would prevent Iran from getting a nuclear weapon and strengthen the security of the United States, Israel, and the region. President Obama and Secretary Kerry have been persistent and determined in pursuit of this goal, building on a decade of bipartisan pressure and diplomacy. Getting the rest of the way to a final deal by June won't be easy, but it is absolutely crucial. I know well that the devil is always in the details in this kind of negotiation. So I strongly support President Obama and Secretary Kerry's efforts between now and June to reach a final deal that verifiably cuts off all of Iran's paths to a nuclear weapon, imposes an intrusive inspection program with no sites off limits, extends breakout time, and spells out clear and overwhelming consequences for violations. The onus is on Iran and the bar must be set high. It is also vital that our efforts to deny Iran a nuclear weapon be part of a comprehensive strategy to check its regional ambitions, defend our allies and partners, and reinforce American leadership in the Middle East. There is much to do and much more to say in the months ahead, but for now diplomacy deserves a chance to succeed.

MSNBC: "Hillary Clinton: 'I would consider' anti-Citizens United amendment"

By Alex Seitz-Wald

July 21, 2014, 7:28 p.m. EDT

While eying a potential presidential run that would surely be boosted by deep-pocketed super PACs, Hillary Clinton said Monday evening that she's open to supporting a constitutional amendment to overturn the Supreme Court's Citizens United decision, which opened the door to the outside groups and the flood of money that poured into the political process with them.

Taking questions from Facebook users at the social media giant's California headquarters Monday evening, Clinton expressed some interest in the idea. "I would consider supporting an amendment among these lines that would prevent the abuse of our political system by excessive amounts of money if there is no other way to deal with the Citizen's United decision," she said in response to a question on the measure.

Amending the Constitution is an almost impossibly uphill battle, but the idea has secured support from almost all the Democrats in the Senate, which will vote on the measure later this year.

The former first lady is currently on a book tour for her memoir "Hard Choices," which was released in June. The publicity campaign is being seen as part of a months-long rollout leading up to a decision on whether or not she'll run for president. Clinton has previously said that she'll decide by the end of the year.

On Monday, Clinton also fielded questions on a number of other issues, and proclaimed "The Brothers Karamazov" by Fyodor Dostoyevsky to be her favorite book, while "Goodnight Moon" is the first book she plans to read to her future grandchild.

On the ongoing fighting in Gaza between Israel and the Palestinians, the former secretary of state said she hopes "there can be a ceasefire soon to end the conflict," noting that she negotiated the last such deal.

On the Malaysian airliner shot down over rebel-held territory in Ukraine, Clinton placed some blame at the feet of Russian President Vladimir Putin. "[T]here is a price to pay for this kind of behavior," she said of Putin, adding the crash victims were "murdered."

Later, at a separate Q&A session hosted by Twitter at its offices, Clinton elaborated on her view of Russia's involvement in Ukraine. "There is no doubt in my mind," she said, that pro-Russian rebels in Eastern Ukraine "are very heavily influenced, if not directed by Moscow." She added that Russian intelligence officers and special operators "played a big role in the insurgency," and said the militants may be outright controlled by Putin.

Meanwhile, back at Facebook, asked what her first action would be if she became president, Clinton responded with an answer that seemed designed to appeal to the vocal populist wing of the Democratic party. “Answering hypothetically … the next president should work to grow the economy, increase upward mobility, and decrease inequality,” she said.

For those looking for any hints about a potential 2016 run, Clinton offered a tantalizing endorsement of the state that holds the nation’s first primary. “I love New Hampshire,” she replied to a user who asked if she would visit the Granite State.

Clinton is on a swing through Silicon Valley, a fertile ground for donors to a potential presidential campaign, stopping at Google’s headquarters between the visits to Facebook and Twitter.

Clinton is expected to raise more than a billion dollars if she runs, with even more money going to an archipelago of super PACs and other outside groups supporting her. Already, three major super PACs are working on her behalf, while there are at least a half dozen smaller ones.

In the lead-up to the 2012 presidential election, President Obama chose a similar forum as Clinton’s to endorse an amendment to roll back Citizens United, telling Reddit users that “we need to seriously consider” an amendment.

Still, Obama and his allies maintained that they would not “unilaterally disarm” in the campaign finance arms race. As long as Republicans could use super PACs, Democrats will too, they said. Clinton’s allies are already using a similar line to defend their outside activism on her behalf.

CNN: “Hillary Clinton would consider backing bid to limit money in politics”

By Dan Merica

July 21, 2014, 7:37 p.m. EDT

When Hillary Clinton ran for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2008, she raised and spent more than $250 million to eventually lose to Barack Obama, according to the Federal Election Commission.

That was then.

On Monday, Clinton - who is now weighing another run at the presidency in 2016 - was asked during a Facebook question and answer session whether she would "support a constitutional amendment" to overturn the Supreme Court's "Citizen's United" ruling and limit the amount corporations and outside influences can contribute to political campaigns.

"I would consider supporting an amendment among these lines," Clinton responded. "That would prevent the abuse of our political system by excessive amounts of money if there is no other way to deal with the Citizen's United decision."

The 2010 Citizens United decision opened the floodgates for outside money in politics and ballooned the amount spent on campaigns.

Even though Clinton has said she wants to limit money in politics, people close to her are preparing to raise massive sums for a possible presidential bid.

Some of her biggest 2008 donors told CNN in January that they are waiting for her decision on whether to run with open wallets, while a cadre of outside groups – many of whom were created because of the Citizens United decision – have begun to raise money in order to be helpful to her possible candidacy.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Although many pro-Clinton Democratic operatives say they wish big money was not a part of politics, the pro-Clinton groups have embraced the law.

"You have to play the game with the rules as they are," said a source at Priorities USA, a group that plans to raise big money to support Clinton if she runs. "We can't unilaterally disarm."

Many of Clinton's 17 Facebook answers dealt with substantive issues.

On violence in the Mideast, she wrote that she hoped "there can be a ceasefire soon to end the conflict" and was "fully supportive" of Secretary of State John Kerry traveling to Egypt in a bid help broker a deal.

She also wrote that her first move as President, should she run and be elected, would be to "grow the economy, increase upward mobility, and decrease inequality."

But like many Facebook posts, some were less than serious.

She agreed to sign two copies of "Hard Choices" - her new memoir - and in a response to "Rufus Doggetti," Clinton wrote that, yes, from time to time she does let her dogs on the sofa.

She also wrote that her favorite book was "The Brothers Karamazov" by Fyodor Dostoyevsky and that the first book she would read her new grandchild would be "Goodnight Moon" by Margaret Wise Brown.

And in the category of substantive in the future, Clinton offered this nod to the first-in-the-nation primary state: "I love New Hampshire!"

In addition to sitting down for Facebook questions, Clinton toured the company's Menlo Park, California, headquarters. She spent the morning at Google and participated in a conversation with company employees.

Clinton also had a live-streamed conversation with Twitter staff, where the former secretary of state was interviewed by Katie Stanton, who spent six months working for the Clinton State Department in 2010 when she served as special adviser to the Office of Innovation.

Clinton fielded questions on college affordability, women in leadership and her 2016 aspirations. Many of the questions were asked by Twitter staff and famous Twitter users.

She heralded the role of social media, but said she hoped in the future that "we would see a maturing of the use of social media, not just to score points ... but to try to create space for real conversations."

Clinton also tacked to her party's left on college affordability, an issue many progressives and liberals have heralded as critical.

"Too many young people are being priced out of going to college or staying in college," Clinton said.

She later added, "I think it is one of the biggest problems we have in the country. College education just costs too much. It is hard to relate the rise in cost to the actual product that has certainly changed somewhat, but not so dramatically as to justify those costs."

Clinton sidestepped a query from soccer star Julie Foudy about who Clinton's running mate would be if she ran in 2016.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I think Julie has been a tremendous soccer player but I am not ready to answer her question," Clinton said, "because I am not even ready yet to say that I am going to do it or that I would get it done."

Media Matters for America: "While Maureen Dowd Smears Clinton Foundation, Colleague Nicholas Kristof Works With It"

By Matt Gertz

July 21, 2014, 3:54 p.m. EDT

New York Times columnist Maureen Dowd has attempted to scandalize the Bill, Hillary, and Chelsea Clinton Foundation in two consecutive columns, even as colleague Nicholas Kristof prepares to participate in the Clintons' charitable events for the sixth straight year.

Dowd's attacks on the Clinton Foundation are the latest salvo in her decades-long anti-Clinton campaign.

In her July 19 column, Dowd baselessly criticized the "foundation dishabille" as part of the "percussive drama" that supposedly surrounds the Clintons. Dowd devoted her July 12 column to lashing out at Chelsea Clinton for giving paid speeches and donating the fees to the Clinton Foundation, an activity which Dowd described as somehow "unseemly."

The Clinton Foundation's website says its mission is "to improve global health, strengthen economies, promote health and wellness, and protect the environment." But Dowd baselessly smeared the Foundation as a phony organization intended solely to benefit the Clinton family, claiming that Chelsea Clinton was "joining her parents in cashing in to help feed the rapacious, gaping maw of Clinton Inc." by giving her speaking fees to the Clinton Foundation rather than donating the proceeds to "some independent charity not designed to burnish the Clinton name as her mother ramps up to return to the White House and as she herself drops a handkerchief about getting into politics."

Dowd's criticism raises questions about The New York Times' position on the Foundation given Dowd colleague Nicholas Kristof's involvement in Clinton charitable events through the Clinton Global Initiative. Founded by President Clinton in 2005 and merged into the broader Clinton Foundation last year, CGI brings together global leaders from the public, nonprofit, and private sectors to help solve pressing international issues.

Kristof has participated in CGI's annual meeting in each of the last five years, either by delivering remarks or moderating panels. In a 2010 "CGI Stories" video, Kristof praised the group, saying, "There has been a bit of a change in how global poverty and global health is perceived and I think what's happening at CGI both reflects that and also helps shape it."

In an interview with Media Matters, Kristof said CGI events give him "a chance to meet people who converge from around the world" that are focused on issues that interest him, such as global women's rights, development, and education. He said that he plans to attend the group's annual meeting in September if he is invited. He declined to comment on Dowd's work.

The Times also declined to comment on the tension between Dowd's campaign to scandalize the foundation and Kristof's continued relationship with it.

The paper's Ethical Journalism handbook suggests that the paper has not institutionally adopted Dowd's critique. It states that Times journalists "must consult with the standards editor or the deputy editorial page editor" before addressing "groups that might figure in coverage they provide, edit, package or supervise, especially if the setting might suggest a close relationship to the sponsoring group." It also bars them from accepting "invitations to speak where their function is to attract customers to an event primarily intended as profit-making."

Associated Press: "Clinton: US, Europe Should Get Tough on Russia"

By Ken Thomas

July 21, 2014, 10:41 p.m. EDT

WASHINGTON (AP) – Hillary Rodham Clinton said Monday that the U.S. and Europe should work together to develop tougher sanctions on Russia while she backed President Barack Obama's calls for a thorough investigation into the passenger jet that was shot down last week over Ukraine.

Clinton said in a Facebook chat from the company's headquarters in Menlo Park, California, that tougher sanctions would make clear to Russian President Vladimir Putin "that there is a price to pay for this kind of behavior." The former secretary of state said she agreed with Obama's comments earlier Monday urging "immediate and full access" for investigators combing through the wreckage of the downed plane.

"We should do more to ensure a thorough investigation that not only respects those who were murdered in the attack on the plane, but also tries to find answers to who is responsible," Clinton wrote during the question-and-answer session on the popular social media site.

Obama accused pro-Russian separatists of removing evidence and bodies from the crash site and said the burden was on Russia and Putin to compel the separatists to cooperate with the investigation. He said if Russia continues to violate Ukraine's sovereignty, Moscow "will only further isolate itself" and the economic costs will increase.

Clinton said the U.S. should encourage Europeans to ensure that they are less dependent upon Russian energy. She called for "more support given to the Ukrainians to guard their borders and protect themselves."

The potential 2016 Democratic presidential candidate responded to a wide-ranging list of questions on Facebook that covered her book, "Hard Choices," domestic and foreign policy issues, her favorite book and her role as a grandmother-to-be.

Clinton said she was hopeful for a cease-fire between Hamas and Israel to end the fighting in the Gaza Strip and noted that she negotiated the last cease-fire in 2012. She said she was "fully supportive" of Secretary of State John Kerry's work with the Egyptians to bring a halt to the fighting.

Asked what her first action would be if elected president, Clinton said, "answering hypothetically ... the next president should work to grow the economy, increase upward mobility and decrease inequality."

Clinton listed her favorite book as Fyodor Dostoyevsky's "The Brothers Karamazov" and said she already had a first children's book picked out to read to her future grandchild: Margaret Wise Brown's "Goodnight Moon."

The former first lady appeared at an event at Google's Mountain View, California, headquarters earlier Monday and ended the day at a forum at Twitter's offices in San Francisco.

Clinton, who has amassed more than 1.6 million followers since joining Twitter last year, shared advice for women considering entering politics, advocated for Internet freedom and urged the U.S. to take steps to rein in student debt and the high cost of attending college.

The Hill: "Clinton calls for tougher sanctions on Russia"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By Mario Trujillo

July 21, 2014, 6:32 p.m. EDT

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton on Monday called for stricter sanctions on Russia after the crash of a Malaysia Airlines flight in Eastern Ukraine last week.

"We should work to bring our European allies together with us on tougher sanctions that would make it clear to [Russian President Vladimir] Putin that there is a price to pay for this kind of behavior, and we should encourage Europeans to start immediately to make sure they are less dependent on Russian energy so they are not intimidated," Clinton said during a Facebook question and answer.

Clinton said she agrees with President Obama that "all those murdered" deserve a full investigation into last week's events, when Malaysia Airlines Flight 17 was shot down while carrying nearly 300 people.

"Finally, I would like to see more support given to the Ukrainians to guard their borders and to protect themselves," she said.

The United States, Ukraine and others have said there is strong evidence to suggest that pro-Russian separatists shot down the plane. President Obama and others have criticized Russia for creating an unstable climate in Ukraine by backing the militants.

The United States last week imposed its harshest sanctions yet on Russian companies before the crash. And on Monday, Obama said costs would increase for Russia if it continues to support the separatists with training and weapons.

Last week, Clinton said there was a growing awareness the separatists were involved, and the surface-to-air weapons likely came from Russia.

Clinton participated in the question and answer Monday while on a trip to Silicon Valley, visiting with Facebook, Twitter and Google.

She remained coy about her 2016 presidential ambitions but offered a few morsels, saying, "I love New Hampshire," in response to one question about visiting the first-in-the-nation presidential primary state.

Answering "hypothetically," she said at another point her priority as president would be to "grow the economy, increase upward mobility, and decrease inequality."

She also said she would consider supporting a constitutional amendment to undo the effects of a pair of Supreme Court decision that rolled back campaign finance restrictions.

Her answer, however, was more cautious than many Senate Democrats, who have vowed to vote on such a proposal.

"I would consider supporting an amendment among these lines that would prevent the abuse of our political system by excessive amounts of money, if there is no other way to deal with the Citizen's United decision," she said.

Politico: "Hillary Clinton defends Israel on Gaza"

By Katie Glueck

July 21, 2014, 11:02 p.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton on Monday repeatedly stressed that Israel was "provoked" by Hamas in the current conflict roiling the Middle East, offering among her strongest statements yet concerning the hostilities in Gaza.

The former secretary of state and possible 2016 Democratic front-runner delivered those comments during a question-and-answer session at the Twitter headquarters in San Francisco. She weighed in on the conflict between Israel and Hamas militants in several interviews last week as well, criticizing the leadership of Hamas as Israel launched a ground invasion into Gaza in response to rockets Hamas was lobbing into the country.

"You mention, in particular, the difficulties we currently are seeing in the Middle East," she said, in response to a question about how Hamas and the Israel Defense Forces use Twitter. "Because of the actions by Hamas, first to rain rockets onto Israel, Israel being provoked — because I do think that was part of the Hamas calculation, to provoke Israel to respond, to defend itself, which any nation has to do if you are under attack like that, and then we see the unfortunate effects of any conflict with innocent people being caught in the crossfires."

Her remarks came as part of a question-and-answer session with Katie Stanton, Twitter's vice president of global media who previously served on the innovation team at the State Department during Clinton's tenure there.

The livestream event appeared to draw only several hundred viewers, and the bulk of the questions seemed to come from celebrities and well-known activists including Kerry Washington, Malala Yousafzai, Amy Poehler and Melinda Gates, along with Twitter employees.

In the interview, which ran a little over 45 minutes, Clinton touched on a wide range of issues, from empowering women and girls — a favorite subject of hers, to blasting Russia's Vladimir Putin, telling women not to be too hard on themselves, and lamenting the skyrocketing costs of college.

"College education just costs too much," she said. "It's hard to relate the rise in cost to the actual product, that has certainly changed somewhat, but not so dramatically as to justify those costs."

Clinton, who is on tour to promote her memoir of her time at the State Department, "Hard Choices," has come under fire for the way she discussed her personal finances — saying, for example, that when she and former President Bill Clinton left the White House, they were "dead broke." On Monday night, she appeared cautious as she struck a personal note about how she and her husband paid for law school, noting that after graduation, they took "relatively" low-paying jobs.

"When we were in law school, we both took out loans, we both worked two, three, four jobs but when we graduated, we had the opportunity to pay back as a percentage of our income," she said as she outlined possible answers to handling education costs. "And we both took relatively low-paying jobs —I went to work for the Children's Defense Fund, Bill became a law professor in Arkansas, I later moved to Arkansas, taught at the law school and made, like, $17,000, and we were paying back as a percentage. And we could keep up with those payments without having to sacrifice too much."

She also sought to inject humor throughout the conversation. At one point, responding to a tweet that asked her about her biggest accomplishment as secretary of state and was signed "xoxo," Clinton replied, "Spreading 'xoxo' everywhere," before launching into a weightier response touching on a number of her foreign policy achievements.

Asked by soccer star Julie Foudy about who her running mate might be, Clinton said she would take a pass on the question.

"I'm not even ready yet to say that I'm going to do it or that I would get it done," she said of 2016.

Earlier in the day, Clinton hosted a Facebook chat, where she received several hundred questions. She fielded a wide range of issues, from campaign finance — she would "consider" a constitutional amendment "that would prevent the abuse of our political system by excessive amounts of money if there is no other way to deal with the Citizens United decision" — to which is the first book she plans to read to her grandchild, whose birth is expected later this year ("Goodnight Moon" was her answer.).

In both the Facebook chat and on Twitter, Clinton said she supported an investigation into the fallen Malaysia Airlines flight, which crashed in Ukraine last week, and urged Europe to step up its efforts to hold Russia accountable amid questions over Moscow's ties to pro-Russian separatists in Ukraine.

ABC News blog: The Note: "Hillary Clinton: Israel 'Provoked' By Hamas"

By Liz Kreutz

July 22, 2014, 3:00 a.m. EDT

During back-to-back Facebook and Twitter chats Monday evening, Hillary Clinton weighed in again on the growing tensions in the Middle East, reiterating her hope for a ceasefire in the region and stressing her view that Israel has largely been "provoked" by Hamas throughout the conflict.

"You mention in particular the difficulties we currently are seeing in the Middle East because of the actions by Hamas, first to rain rockets on to Israel. Israel being provoked," Clinton told Twitter's VP of Global Media (and former State Department employee), Katie Jacob Stanton, when asked how social media has changed diplomacy between conflicting nations, particularly with IDF and Hamas, who regularly communicate via Twitter.

She added: "I do think that was part of the Hamas calculation, to provoke Israel to respond to defend itself, which any nation has to do if you are under attack like that."

Clinton went on to give an idealistic view of how social media should be used between countries: "It is a fact of social media right now that too often people use it as a weapon, instead of an opportunity. And maybe one of the ways we can think together about the next phase in the development of social media is as a tool of outreach, a tool of reconciliation, a tool of negotiation, and maybe even resolution," she said.

Earlier in the day during the Facebook Q&A, Clinton, who as secretary of state helped to negotiate the last ceasefire in November 2012, said she hopes there can be another ceasefire soon to end the current conflict, and added that she is "fully supportive" of Secretary Kerry's efforts do so.

Secretary Kerry is currently in Cairo, Egypt where he is working to negotiate a ceasefire in the Gaza strip. Early Monday he announced the U.S. would give $47 million in aid to Gaza and voiced "concern" over civilian deaths – more than 583 Palestinians and 27 Israelis over the past two weeks—and meanwhile reaffirmed support for Israel's self-defense.

Hillary Clinton's comments were part of the two social media chats she participated in Monday during a swing through Silicon Valley, where she visited the headquarters of Google, Facebook, and Twitter. In addition to the Middle East, Hillary Clinton answered questions about Ukraine, saying there "was no doubt" in her mind that the Ukrainian separatists were getting help from Russia and pushed for European nations to enact stricter sanctions on Putin; abortion rights, where she again slammed the Hobby Lobby ruling; and college tuition, which she says, "costs too much."

During the Twitter chat, Clinton took questions not only from users who submitted them using the hashtag #AskHillary, but from a range of high-profile friends and celebrities, which drew a bit of cynical skepticism from people watching online.

The questions came from Amy Poehler (who Clinton conceded "did do a really wicked imitation of me."), Malala, Melinda Gates, and Scandal star, Kerry Washington (who Clinton called "terrific.") In addition, soccer star, Julie Foudy, snuck in a question about 2016, asking who would be her VP pick. But Clinton didn't even pretend to answer.

"I'm going to take a pass on that," she said, and moved on.

Hillary Clinton is swinging through Silicon Valley this week on her Hard Choices book tour. As part of the tour, she stopped at Facebook's headquarters in Menlo Park, Calif., and held a Q&A with users on her book's Facebook page.

Here is all of the new information to come out of that Q&A:

- Hillary Clinton agrees with President Obama's statement Monday that Russian President Vladimir Putin has "direct responsibility" for the downing of Malaysia Airways Flight 17.

- Hillary Clinton supports a cease-fire to end the ongoing conflict in Gaza.

- Hillary Clinton "enjoyed" writing her book.

- Hillary Clinton "supported" closing the Guantánamo Bay naval station, but acknowledges the difficulties Obama has faced in closing it.

- Hillary Clinton would theoretically support a constitutional amendment to overturn the Citizens United decision to "prevent the abuse of our political system by excessive amounts of money."

- Hillary Clinton's favorite book is The Brothers Karamazov.

- Hillary Clinton is inspired by Nelson Mandela's "courage and capacity for forgiveness."

- Hillary Clinton is "so excited [she] cannot wait!" to be a grandmother.

- The first book she reads to her grandchild will be Goodnight Moon.

- Hillary Clinton is "committed to" women's rights, gay rights, and religious freedom.

- Hillary Clinton opposes the Supreme Court's recent Hobby Lobby ruling.

- "From time to time," Hillary Clinton lets her three dogs sit on the sofa. She generally loves dogs.

- Hillary Clinton also loves the state of New Hampshire.

- Hillary Clinton looks forward to going back to Chicago.

- If you ask politely, Hillary Clinton will sign your copy of her book.

- It was a "real treat" for Hillary Clinton to answer Facebook users' questions.

The Hill: "Republican wants Benghazi hearings to start in August"

By Molly K. Hooper

July 22, 2014, 6:00 a.m. EDT

A Republican lawmaker says he wants a newly formed committee that is investigating the 2012 Benghazi attacks to start holding hearings during the August recess.

Rep. Bill Huizenga (R-Mich.) tells The Hill that Rep. Trey Gowdy (R-S.C.), the chairman of the Select panel, is busy hiring staffers for the high-profile panel.

"I hope that they start holding hearings even if we're not here in August," he said. It remains unclear, however, if that will happen.

Asked if former secretary of State Hillary Clinton should testify on the attacks that left four Americans dead, Huizenga said the potential 2016 Democratic presidential contender still has questions to answer.

Politico: "Martin O'Malley set to return to Iowa"

By Maggie Haberman

July 22, 2014, 6:02 a.m. EDT

Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley is heading back to Iowa this weekend, just weeks after the Democrat — who has said he's exploring a 2016 presidential run — was the keynote speaker at the state Democratic convention.

O'Malley will appear at fundraisers in targeted state Senate races, a source familiar with the trip said.

It's the second trip of the cycle for O'Malley to the Hawkeye State, and comes after he challenged the White House over their policy of deportations of Latin American children who have come across the Southwestern border to escape violence in their own countries.

He will appear at four fundraisers, including one in Clinton for Sen. Rita Hart, one in North Liberty for Senate candidate Kevin Kinney, and two for Jack Hatch, one in Council Bluffs and one in Sioux City.

He's making a repeat visit on Hatch's behalf, after holding events with him on his last visit.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

O'Malley is the only Democrat who is known to be likely to run at this point, and he has a progressive record that he could use to establish himself as to the left of runaway frontrunner Hillary Clinton. (Clinton says she has yet to decide if she's running, but most of her allies believe she will.)

During O'Malley's last visit, retiring Sen. Tom Harkin (D-Iowa) praised O'Malley credentials as a model of progressive causes.

The Daily Beast: "Missouri Governor Jay Nixon To Visit Iowa"

By Ben Jacobs

July 21, 2014

[Subtitle:] Jay Nixon, the two-term Democratic governor of Missouri, is visiting Iowa Tuesday. Does this mean there's yet another Democratic contender in 2016?

With his scheduled visit to an ethanol plant in Emmetsburg, Iowa on Tuesday, did Missouri Governor Jay Nixon signal his interest in running for President in 2016? Probably not.

While Nixon has long been considered a potential Democratic candidate if Hillary Clinton decides not to run , the two-term governor's visit to Iowa seems to be driven entirely by local political concerns. Nixon is visiting Project Liberty, a brand new ethanol plant that processes cellulosic ethanol, which is made from the waste parts of corn like the husk and the cob. In contrast, traditional ethanol is made from the actual corn kernels.

Poet, the company which operates the plant, has several plants in Missouri and Nixon is apparently going to promote the new process and encourage similar plants to be built in his home state. The trip is his only stop in the Hawkeye State and the event is closed to the public, meaning that Nixon will not to get to meet any potential caucusgoers.

Iowa has witnessed a dearth of visits from Democratic hopefuls this cycle, with only Maryland Governor Martin O'Malley and Vermont Senator Bernie Sanders making appearences so far. The limited nature of this trip means that the Missouri governor, who has mentioned the need for a 2016 Democratic candidate from the heartland in the past, can't be added to this list.

But, then again, no politician visits Iowa by accident.

Mediaite: "POLITICO Reporter: Media Access to Hillary Clinton Is Intensely Limited"

By Eddie Scarry

July 21, 2014, 2:31 p.m. EDT

POLITICO reporter Maggie Haberman's aggressive Hillary Clinton coverage has made her an expert on the subject. But, as Haberman said Monday on C-SPAN2, Clinton isn't the easiest beat to tackle.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Asked to describe the difference in media accessibility between Clinton and New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, another political figure Haberman has experience covering, Haberman said it's "night and day."

"What has been really striking about Hillary Clinton's book tour," Haberman said, "is she has not taken a single question, that I know of at least … from reporters who are attending."

Haberman went on to describe the "very controlled interviews" Clinton has granted to media recently. "There is very little that is sort of up in the air and unexpected about them."

By contrast, Haberman said when travelig with Christie she has been able to "get really right up close with him." She said, "You just can't get that with Clinton."

Politico blog: Dylan Byers on Media: "Halper book: Clintons lobbied GE to get rid of MSNBC's David Shuster"

By Hadas Gold

July 21, 2014, 3:15 p.m. EDT

Hillary and Bill Clinton went to the top of the NBC food chain, all the way up to General Electric's board, to get back at MSNBC's David Shuster in 2008, according to Daniel Halper's forthcoming book "Clinton Inc."

Halper, the online editor at the conservative Weekly Standard, details how far the Clinton camp went to get back at Shuster for saying that Chelsea Clinton was "sort of being pimped out in some weird sort of way" for lobbying super delegates on her mother's behalf during the presidential primaries.

"According to a source close to the situation, the Clintons called people on the board of NBC's parent company General Electric to say, 'Well, this is outrageous, how NBC News and MSNBC are handling this, and we need to do something about it,'" Halper writes. "Before long, GE's chairman Jeffrey Immelt, was on the phone with Jeff Zucker, the president and CEO of NBC Universal at the time, and (former NBC News president) Steve Capus asking, 'What the hell is going on over there? Why are my board members talking about the reporter, and why is your reporter referring to Chelsea as a prostitute?'"

The strife between Shuster and the Clintons was well documented during the 2008 campaign and a series of heated emails between Shuster and Clinton spokesperson Philippe Reines were published by POLITICO at the time. At one point, the Clinton campaign threatened to pull out of a debate hosted by NBC News.

In the book, Halper notes that Wolfson also purposely didn't connect Shuster to the Clintons when he wanted to personally apologize, instead telling him to email Clinton aide Huma Abedin. Wolfson then went to the press and said Shuster was refusing to apologize.

The Clinton campaign, Halper writes, "wanted to make it look like men, such as David Shuster, were beating up on the woman who could be the first female president of the U.S."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Shuster ended up being suspended for two weeks. He was fired in 2010 after filming a pilot for CNN without MSNBC's approval. He now hosts a show on Al Jazeera America.

“Finally, [the campaign] sent a message to the media: You may like Obama more than Hillary, but you’d better watch what you say because we have the power to destroy you," Halper writes. "To deliver their message, a popular ex-president, the nation’s most famous senator, and their powerful friends bullied a relatively obscure reporter with powerless friends and spineless bosses. While they were at it, the press and public were misled about his attempts to apologize."

Halper’s book leaked last week when a man identifying himself as Robert Josef Wright sent out a blast email to media executives, editors and journalists with PDFs of all 317-pages. The book is scheduled to hit shelves on Tuesday.

Update (5:30 p.m.):

Clinton spokesperson Nick Merrill said in an email that Halper should be treated the same as "Blood Feud" author Ed Klein and "Her Way" author Jeff Gerth.

"Daniel Halper has joined the discredited and disgraced ranks of Ed Klein and Jeff Gerth, his book came and went so fast that nobody bothered to read it, and nobody will," Merrill said.

MAJOR DOMESTIC INITIATIVES

Alliance for a Healthier Generation (AHG)

Kaiser Permanente has awarded the Alliance a $5.3 million grant to expand the Healthy Schools Program in six new markets. This is embargoed until the formal announcement in early 2013.

Senior Alliance team members continue to meet with the ABA, Coke, PepsiCo and Dr Pepper Snapple about expanding Alliance nutrition guidelines to afterschool programs and other child-focused settings.

Clinton Health Matters Initiative (CHMI)

Mayor Steve Pougnet of Palm Springs has raised more than $200,000 to support local CHMI efforts in the Coachella Valley. The Desert Healthcare Foundation has agreed to match these finds and to administer the funds in partnership with the Foundation.

The CHMI has amassed more than 20 pledges to showcase at the Health Matters conference in January.

With the support of GE, CHMI will add Houston to its list of focus communities in early 2013. This is embargoed information.

MAJOR INTERNATIONAL INITIATIVES

Clinton Development Initiative (CDI)

Rwanda (CHDI)

Construction of the soybean factory is 70 percent complete and is projected to be complete in June/July 2013. The boiler arrived at the site last week. From December 22 to January 2, work on the site will be put on hold for the holidays.

Regarding the AGRA project, planting is now complete and crops look good in the areas that received rains. The AGRA representative who visited the site last week was very pleased with the progress on the field and the way CHDI has set up its demos. CHDI's report for the AGRA project last semester has been sent to the AGRA headquarters.

Clinton Giustra Sustainable Growth Initiative (CGSGI)

CGSGI is concluding 2012 with some key accomplishments, including:

- Completion of over 47,000 cataract surgeries in Peru with the 50,000 goal expected to be reached by March, 2013 and at a cost of $160/surgery, which is $40 less per surgery than the original targeted cost of $200.

- Training and certification of 5,300 construction workers in Colombia, exceeding the 5,000 target.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- Investment approval of two new ventures in Cartagena, Colombia including 1) creation of a Manpower Training Center that will train over 20,000 low income residents over the next ten years for jobs in the hospitality and other sectors and 2) creation of a Supply Chain Impact Enterprise for the purchase and collection of produce, fish and seafood from small vendors and producers for market and distribution to hotels, restaurants and supermarkets. This new venture will create over 1,000 jobs and impact over 4,000 beneficiaries.

- Restructuring of CGSGI's strategy to achieve scalable, sustainable and measurable results in poverty reduction through the creation of supply chain impact and distribution enterprises that provide poor communities gainful access to markets.

- In addition to the supply chain impact enterprise being formed in Cartagena, CGSGI is developing new projects or pilots that will lead to other potential impact enterprises including a hotel supplier network in Cusco, Peru, a small supplier network for one of Peru's largest supermarkets, and the piloting of an agro value chain opportunity in India with the prospect of benefitting 10,000 farmers.

As you know, CGSGI also hosted a successful Fair Trade summit in December along with the Skoll Foundation and the Avina Foundation. Approximately 40 stakeholders attended including representatives from corporate bodies (e.g. Green Mountain Coffee, Whole Foods, Walmart), NGOs (e.g. Heifer International, Catholic Relief Services), and beneficiaries from Rwanda, Haiti, Costa Rica, and Ecuador. The goal of the summit was to discuss the collaboration and commitments required to take Fair Trade's impact to scale. Both you and Frank Giustra participated in the Summit.

Clinton Global Initiative (CGI)

An additional $1.5 billion or more has now been allocated for the AFL-CIO/AFT CGI America Commitment by New York City public employee pension funds. The funds making these additional allocations represent the NYC Local of the Teamsters, AFSCME, and Transportation Workers Union as well as the Firefighters and Police. This should bring the total raised for the entire commitment well above $4 billion out of the $10 billion original commitment. This follows up on your announcement in a press conference last week of a $1 billion allocation to new investments in infrastructure projects.

On Friday, December 14, as part of the year-round programming in the Response and Resilience Track, CGI held a convening to discuss where collaboration is most needed as we transition from immediate response to reconstruction post Hurricane Sandy. Mayor Mitch Landrieu of New Orleans shared lessons learned from Hurricane Katrina. John Liu, Comptroller of the City of New York, and other federal, state and city government officials from New Jersey and New York along with more than 40 CGI members attended.

Transatlantic 2015 – The Year in Review

Rachel Tausendfreund, Guillaume Xavier-Bender

December 23, 2015

At the start of 2015, the Kremlin looked to be the biggest concern for the transatlantic partners. But the terrorist attacks on the Charlie Hebdo offices in Paris in January quickly changed that calculation. The even deadlier attacks also inspired by the self-proclaimed Islamic State group (ISIS) in Paris and San Bernadino, California, toward years' end ensured that terrorism and the threat of ISIS and terrorism overtook Russia as the dominant transatlantic security concern of 2015.

But the transatlantic story of the year was the refugee crisis — although in fact it was a crisis that the United States left Europe to deal with largely on its own. As the number of refugees reaching Europe climbed dramatically, and climbed again, Europe found itself confronting its worst refugee crisis since World War II. It was a story full of human tragedy, but also hope, and of logistical and political struggles — revealing rifts within Europe and between communities on both sides of the Atlantic.

Though the fallout of the ongoing violence in Syria — both the refugee crisis and threat of ISIS — defined the year, the other big transatlantic stories of the year — both wins and losses — were diplomatic...

Subject:	HRC, Contraceptives, Supreme Court

I would suggest HRC level a political nuclear blast, ASAP, against a Supreme Court decision that could come in June that would end the contraceptive mandate in ObamaCare. Case is now pending. This is going to be explosive with women voters as they understand what could happen, with a huge majority of women strongly supporting contraceptives.

The line is that the current court could put contraceptives under siege, or if contraceptives prevail in the pending case 5-4 a Republican president would name one of more justices, if they have a vacancy or two, who would go after contraceptives.

This is different than the abortion issue. Women overwhelmingly support contraceptives emotionally and in large majorities, and men also support contraceptives, and this includes a large majority of Catholic women and men and moderate evangelicals.

My advice is HRC raise this issue soon, aggressively and visibly. If possible before the coming Republican debate. This is a powerful, powerful issue. The real religious issue is that the right wants to impose its sectarian view of religion on all Americans on contraceptives. A huge and emotional majority would agree with HRC on contraceptives and the sooner and stronger she raises this issue, the better, IMO. Brent

In her first public appearance since the weekend birth of granddaughter Charlotte, Hillary Clinton spoke at an event this evening in New York for an organization that cares for the families of fallen military members, who greeted her with moving stories of their loved ones.

"This a great privilege, but it is also for me emotional as we celebrate the birth of our granddaughter and as I look out and see all of you who are thinking of your loved ones and the life that he or she lived," Clinton said at the event for the Tragedy Assistance Program for Survivors or TAPS, a group that supports, connects and provides grief resources to military families who have lost loved ones.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In the introduction, TAPS president Bonnie Carroll told Clinton she is “family” and gave her the organization’s Lifetime Service Award. Clinton spoke at another event for the group in 2006 and has served as an honorary chairwoman.

Throughout her speech, some in the crowd became emotional and many of them took to the rope line afterwards to share stories of their deceased family members and show photos, with several telling her heartbreaking stories. Some just wanted to take a photo with Clinton, but many more had a story to tell.

One woman, after telling the former secretary of state about her fallen husband, said, “I miss him every day, thank you for coming.”

Clinton listened to their stories and expressed her condolences, saying over and over again, “I am so, so sorry,” at times holding the family members’ hands. One man who urged Clinton to run for president also told her about his nephew who he said “got the run around” and “got screwed at the VA,” referring to the Department of Veterans Affairs.

“We need to fix the VA and we need to fix the mental health system,” he told her. Clinton nodded in agreement.

In her speech, she told the families “it’s really important to me that we never forget your loved ones and we never forget you.”

“At a time when sometimes we seem divided and people seem to be arguing all the time we really have to take stock of how blessed we are and grateful for the men and women who serve us and be thankful that we have through all of our ups and downs and our challenges continues to stand for the values that unite us: freedom and democracy and opportunity and by supporting you all who will serve in the future,” Clinton told the crowd at Stella 43 Trattoria, a restaurant inside the iconic New York City Macy’s store.

CBS News: “Hillary Clinton ‘emotional’ at event for families of fallen military”

Hillary Clinton received a lifetime achievement award from a group that provides support for the families of fallen military service members on Wednesday, thanking the survivors for sharing their often heart-wrenching stories and praising the organization's work.

The award was presented in New York City by the Tragedy Assistance Program for Survivors (TAPS), a group that provides "peer-based emotional support" and "grief and trauma resources" for the families of the departed, according to its website. Clinton has previously served as the group's honorary chairwoman.

Clinton said the event was particularly "emotional" for her, according to the Associated Press, especially given the birth of her granddaughter last Friday. It was the former secretary of state's first public appearance since her daughter Chelsea gave birth to a baby girl, Charlotte Clinton Mezvinsky.

"This a great privilege, but it is also for me emotional as we celebrate the birth of our granddaughter and as I look out and see all of you who are thinking of your loved ones and the life that he or she lived," she said, according to ABC News. "It's really important to me that we never forget your loved ones and we never forget you."

Clinton nodded at her work on the Armed Services Committee when she was a senator from New York, recalling her work with TAPS and other groups to increase survivor benefits for the families of fallen service members.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"We fought, we cajoled," she said, adding that they eventually secured an increase in immediate survivor benefits from $12,000 to $100,000.

Several attendees shared their stories of loss with Clinton. One man described his nephew's frustrating experience with the Veteran's Affairs medical system, which has been buffeted this year by scandal after reports revealed crushing wait times and employee misconduct at VA facilities.

"If you run, and I hope you do, fix the VA and fix the mental health system," he said, according to Buzzfeed. "My nephew was lost, and let me tell you something...he really got screwed."

Another woman told Clinton it had been two years since her brother's suicide.

"Did he get any help at all?" Clinton asked.

"Not the right help," the woman said.

Bonnie Carroll, the president and founder of TAPS, thanked Clinton for her previous work with the group.

"We count you as family," she told Clinton," and we love you a great deal."

Vogue: "State of Play: John Kerry's High-Stakes Year"

By Suzy Hansen

October 2, 2014, 8:00 a.m. EDT

[Subtitle:] Through one international crisis after another, America's Secretary of State is waging a marathon campaign of high-stakes diplomacy.

Back in June, Secretary of State John Kerry traveled to the tiny French village of Saint-Briac-sur-Mer to do something he never could have done while running for president—celebrate his European roots. Kerry's mother, a descendant of the Forbes shipping family, grew up here on an estate called Les Essarts, which was destroyed by the Nazis and then rebuilt as an enormous blue-shuttered château the family still owns today. "Johnnie," as one of his cousins, the town's former mayor, calls him, spent his boyhood summers in this idyllic, immaculate place: all stone buildings, cobbled streets, épiceries with bright awnings, and women in Jean Seberg striped jerseys outside the Bar Tabac de la Poste. Having come from the seventieth-anniversary commemorations of the Normandy invasion, Kerry, 70 himself and slender as the Tin Man, is dressed in a midnight-blue suit and a pink-orange tie, his dense, graying hair as immovable as ever. He glances toward the windswept Brittany coastline and then at the crowds trailing his convoy, eager to see an eminent American so intimately connected with their village give a speech about the war.

I have been traveling with Kerry for several days—from Warsaw to Beirut to France—and though I have caught glimpses of his playful side, the Secretary of State has largely lived up to his reputation for reserve. In the backseat of his SUV, we discuss the elaborate Normandy festivities at Omaha Beach, where President Obama, German chancellor Angela Merkel, and Russian president Vladimir Putin gathered to remember the sacrifice of hundreds of thousands of Allied soldiers—and Kerry is pensive. He speaks of how terrifying the invasion must have been for the soldiers. I ask if he, as a former officer, could put himself in their shoes. He shakes his head. "There was the possibility that we would be killed," he says, referring to his tours of duty in Vietnam, "but it was more remote in that you didn't know when you were going to be ambushed. You didn't know when something was going to happen. In that situation"—D-day—"you know. You are watching boats blown up around you. It's hell."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I compare the America of 70 years ago, the America that liberated France and won the admiration of the world, to the America of today, which seems more embattled and wary. It's a moment, I suggest, "where there are accusations that America is 'pulling back'——"

"No, no! We're not, we're not pulling back," he says. Kerry leans forward in his seat. "That kicks me into gear and makes me want to go out and explain more. We have to make it clearer to people. I intend to, and the president intends to. That's what he did at West Point."

He is referring to President Obama's much-discussed speech in May at the military college, in which he laid out a vision of American foreign policy that emphasized diplomatic engagement over the reflexive use of military force. "We have to build on that," he continues. "And that's what I am going to do."

But Kerry will barely get the chance. The summer will bring a cascading and surreal series of international crises, which keeps him constantly on the move. Rarely a day goes by without shocking and terrifying news: a fierce election dispute in Afghanistan that threatens to bring the country to civil war; the downing of a Malaysia Airlines jetliner in Ukraine; a deadly conflict between Israel and Hamas; the advance across Iraq of the jihadist group ISIS, on whom President Obama authorizes air strikes in mid-August.

During this jolting period Kerry will seem to be everywhere at once, engaging in negotiations, jousting with his foreign counterparts, and struggling to pull off small victories before jumping back on his plane. "I don't think there has ever been a Secretary of State who has thrown himself into the job with as much verve and conviction as this guy has," says Strobe Talbott, a deputy Secretary of State under President Clinton and now the president of the Washington think tank the Brookings Institution as well as a Kerry adviser. "If he can't get a workable and acceptable compromise on a dispute, it's very hard to imagine anybody who can."

Kerry practices just the sort of vigorous diplomacy President Obama spoke about at West Point—but his relentlessness, especially on issues as seemingly intractable as Israeli-Palestinian peace, has been bruising at times. Does America wield the influence in the world that it once did? Critics say that Kerry's go-for-broke diplomatic style raises just this question—and that he has wasted time on problems that the U.S. cannot solve; supporters say that if Kerry achieves a breakthrough in even one of his major endeavors—say, a nuclear deal with Iran—he could be one of the most important Secretaries of State in recent history.

"There's a lot going on," Kerry acknowledges when I meet with him over the summer in his office at the State Department. "But when you have four or five flare-ups at the same time, you've still got to talk to people; you've got to sit down with them face-to-face, look in their eyes, grab the problem, and work through it. So we're managing. We can multitask."

It's a tremendous amount of pressure for someone who already suffered a large-scale defeat in his political career, but Kerry seems at ease. "I feel comfortable, and I feel free," he says of the work he's doing now. "I feel completely liberated. But, you know . . . I was a lot better senator after I ran for president because I had done it. I had run. I came within 59,000 votes in one state"—Ohio—"so for three hours I was president." He smiles to make sure I get what I am not completely sure is a joke.

"I feel like I made a few mistakes, but I didn't blow it," he continues and shrugs. "The one thing I kick myself about back then is not listening to myself a few times . . . not letting it all out."

Democrats could be forgiven for feeling less sanguine about 2004. Many still consider Kerry's loss to President George W. Bush an almost unfathomable debacle. The war in Iraq was proving disastrous at the time, and Kerry had the perfect presidential résumé: a Kennedy-like background, a record of courage in Vietnam, 20 years in the Senate. But some voters found him hard to connect to and perceived an aristocratic air that the Right mercilessly exploited. Swift Boat Veterans for Truth smeared Kerry's military record, Republicans branded him a flip-flopper on Iraq (a war he had voted for in 2002), and, in the end, Kerry lost the popular vote by 3 million.

"I don't think there's anything harder in this life," apart from matters of life and death, "than losing a presidential election," says his friend former Yale classmate and State Department adviser David Thorne. "It requires determination and toughness to get back up on the horse."

After the election, Kerry largely faded from view as he returned to the Senate, chaired the Foreign Relations Committee, and recovered from his loss. "I would say he became more confident," says his longtime chief of staff, David Wade. "That experience of running a campaign like that . . . and then losing in a pretty heartbreaking way. He came out of that experience with a great deal of conviction about how he wanted to spend his 60s and his 70s.

"I also think it left him with a little sense of 'I just don't really give a shit,' " Wade adds. "People are going to make judgments, but you play a long game."

That long game has brought a kind of vindication. Today President Obama's foreign policy happens to look much like Kerry proposed America's should during the campaign in 2004: more modest, more interested in multilateral diplomacy and fighting terrorism on a case-by-case basis. Kerry praises what he calls President Obama's "very careful, hard-nosed approach" to decision-making. "I am impressed by the questions he asks . . . and how he wants to know the strategy and the facts that support that choice before he makes it—not afterward."

The world is also more turbulent, multipolar, and crisis-prone than it was a decade ago. When Kerry succeeded Hillary Clinton as secretary in 2013, after President Obama's presumed choice, Susan Rice, withdrew her name following the attacks in Benghazi, Libya, he faced a dizzying list of problems. The U.S. was in the midst of messy withdrawals from Iraq and Afghanistan. The Israeli-Palestinian peace process was dead. The Arab Spring had upended American policy in the Middle East. Syria had become a humanitarian catastrophe, and Iran still posed a nuclear threat.

Kerry began addressing each with gusto. "The way he views it is that Secretary Clinton was secretary at a time when we had to repair our relationship with the world," says State Department spokesperson Jen Psaki. "He's building on a lot of the work she has done." ("I telephone Hillary here and there and ask her for her thoughts about things," Kerry says. "I have a lot of admiration and friendship for her.")

At press time, Kerry had traveled some 543,687 miles, visited 55 countries, and spent almost 1,200 hours in the air. "He has chosen to tackle head-on some difficult strategic issues," says Zbigniew Brzezinski, the former U.S. national-security adviser, "and these issues would probably deteriorate into more dangerous prospects without some serious signs of U.S. interest."

"He listens well," says Ryan Crocker, former ambassador to Iraq, of Kerry's diplomatic style. "He will listen to his interlocutors, understand their viewpoint, and make his points within the context of where they stand. That kind of empathy goes a long way to creating a climate in which compromise and agreement become possible. And he also has a reputation for absolute honesty and integrity. He never misleads, and he's known for it."

There are those who call Kerry naive or arrogant for believing that he can somehow solve problems that no one else can. "I think he vastly overstates his personal ability to persuade people to do what the U.S. wants," says Stephen Walt, an expert on foreign policy and a professor of international affairs at Harvard. "Kerry is like Madeleine Albright, who said that the U.S. is 'the indispensable nation.' So if a problem happens in the South China Sea or Nigeria or Ukraine, Kerry thinks there's a solution in Washington. And he hops on a plane to try and provide it. I think that view is occasionally correct, but usually not."

Kerry's response is that he would "rather get caught trying than never try at all" (this, incidentally, was also a favorite phrase of President Clinton's). He acknowledges that President Obama has given him "enormous latitude. I actually thanked him a couple of months ago," he tells me. "I said, 'You know, Mr. President, I want to thank you for giving me the breadth to take the ball and roll with it.' "

It's obvious that Kerry is more suited to the diplomatic life than he ever would have been to the modern presidency. He is far less extroverted and eager to please than most politicians—and he can't fake a folksy, telegenic style. He has a solemn air of politeness, which seems to come from a sense of duty. At a press conference in Beirut, for example, I watch a Lebanese journalist yell angrily at him because she believes Kerry's staff has cut the time short. Kerry, halfway off the dais, stops mid-stride, eyebrows raised, and returns to the microphone. "I'm very happy to take your question," he says with gentle amusement. On his plane, he briskly walks the aisles to say hello to members of the press, flashing a T-shirt given to him by a Lebanese security detail, posing obligingly for photos. The routine lasts for only a minute or two before he passes his huddled staff and the hulking bodyguards stowing their weapons, and returns to his cabin—back to work.

Work is a constant. Only rarely do photographers catch him relaxing or kiteboarding on Nantucket, and his reading tends toward serious history and biography (though he recently made time for The Art of Fielding). For a man in his eighth decade, Kerry takes remarkably little time off—but he seems to be having a good time on the road, too. One night in Paris, I run into him outside the gilded Westin hotel near the Tuileries Garden, returning from dinner at Chez L'Ami Louis with David Thorne, his stepson André Heinz, and both men's partners. He stands on the sidewalk extolling the virtues of the wine he'd had that evening, then poses for selfies with some eagle-eyed Boston natives. It is midnight when he disappears into the hotel bar, his staffers trailing behind him, struggling to keep up.

"I really do think some of it comes out of Vietnam," says Wade about Kerry's drive. "He came out of Vietnam with a pretty fundamental conviction that for whatever reasons a lot of his closest friends never came home, and he did. He has this conviction of not wasting time."

Peals of laughter can be heard from his plane cabin when Kerry FaceTimes with his daughter Vanessa, a critical-care physician in Boston, and his two-and-a-half-year-old grandson, Alexander. Kerry's other daughter, Alexandra, a film director, recently had a baby girl. "He's been awesome, actually," Vanessa says of Kerry as grandfather. "I have left him alone to babysit Alexander, which makes me feel really guilty. I remember asking him, 'What are you going to do if the prime minister of Israel calls?' And he said, 'I'll figure it out.' "

"We have many late-night and early-morning phone calls, and John takes every opportunity to get home," reports his wife, Teresa Heinz Kerry, whom he married in 1995 and who quickly became known for her outspokenness and humor on the campaign trail. Now 75, she suffered a seizure last summer while vacationing on Nantucket, and has been keeping out of the public eye through her recovery. "I have learned so much about the brain and the time it takes to recover from a seizure such as mine," she adds. "I feel blessed to have the support of my husband—who quite literally lay beside me in my hospital bed last year."

Kerry's first wife was Vanessa and Alexandra's mother, Julia Thorne, who died of cancer in 2006. (She and Kerry divorced in 1988.) Since her death, Kerry has become assertive with parental advice. Vanessa remembers when she was getting married in 2009—Kerry was senator then—her father handed her a sketch of what resembled a wedding dress. "I don't know what he was going for—I think it was sort of a strapless gown that was formfitting up top and flowing on the bottom. He drew on a sticky note, like, 'This is what I think the dress should look like.' He genuinely had been thinking about it. It's been really sweet to see him cross some of the normal territory because we don't have our mom."

"Most of the rest of the world doesn't lie awake at night worrying about America's presence; they worry about what would happen in our absence," Kerry told the graduating class at Yale this May, sounding like the idealistic young man who signed up to serve in Vietnam. In other ways, though, he remains the heartbroken veteran who turned against the war, too. "I think the president and I share a tremendous sense of the damage that was done by the prior administration's approach—particularly to Iraq, and its inattention to Afghanistan," he says to me during our interview at the State Department. America's "wars of choice . . . never should have become what they were, and never should have taken place."

His office suite, decorated with traditional Washington Federal-style furniture and Oriental rugs in patterns of scarlet and blue, overlooks the Lincoln and Jefferson memorials. It's a handsome but not particularly personal space, and I imagine Kerry prefers his plane or Boston, where he works out of an office in his Beacon Hill town house.

I ask about the fears of American decline expressed so often on the political Right. "Well, first of all, there's no empire; there's no desire for empire. The age of empire is over," he tells me. "What we're looking at now is an age of alliances and partnerships."

He adds that "democracy is not on the wane. People want democracy." What we have to be mindful of is "young people around the world being co-opted by the demagoguery of individual leaders. If we don't find a global approach to them, we're all going to feel the heat." This brings terrorism into our conversation; he calls it "the instrument of choice that fills the vacuum left by inadequate governance."

His assessment of the terrorist group ISIS and their murderous tactics is unsparing: "They're ugly. They're really horrible—as bad as anything I've seen in public life. They're willing to kill indiscriminately." He adds that "they have proclaimed definitively that they intend to attack the West" and that countries across the Middle East—from Israel to Iran to Syria to Jordan—oppose the group: "All of us are unwilling to tolerate the rise of a jihadist ISIS."

I ask him if it's painful to see the sectarian deterioration in Iraq. "Well, it makes me angry," he says. "Painful is not the word I'd choose. We never should have turned it upside down. Having done so, they"—the Bush administration—"never put a political process together." We will speak about Iraq again after the country's embattled leader, Nouri al-Maliki, resigns, and shortly before the execution by ISIS of American journalist James Foley. Over the phone, Kerry will express some cautious optimism: "It's moving in the right direction with Maliki stepping down peacefully." A legitimate government, he says, "was the prerequisite for President Obama, from day one, to say now we can do something about ISIL"—an alternative name for ISIS. "The U.S. is not going to get involved in any on-the-ground combat troops . . . but we're not going to shy away from equipping and assisting."

The fighting that broke out between Israel and Hamas in the Gaza Strip captured Kerry's focus like no other development this summer. In July, Fox News caught him on a live microphone speaking to his Deputy Chief of Staff Jonathan Finer and seeming to complain about the scope of Israel's incursion into Gaza ("It's a hell of a pinpoint operation," he'll tell Finer sarcastically). Back on air, he will quickly champion Israel's right to defend itself, as he will even after being criticized by Israeli leaders who publicly dismiss Kerry's efforts to broker peace.

With me he defends his attempt to get a cease-fire. "The level of collateral damage that was taking place inevitably was going to turn against Israel and be harmful to the overall effort and harden people against cutting some kind of long-term agreement. So that's why we were pushing. We continue to work at this and we're going to, despite frustrations in one camp or another—because the stakes are very, very high."

At the end of the summer, Kerry traveled to Australia and Myanmar and declared, upon his return, that he would be turning his attention to "long-term opportunities" in that region of the world. It was a reminder that Kerry has another two years to serve as the president's chief diplomat, and much ground still to cover. If you ask him about the legacy he hopes to leave, however, he practically snaps. “I don’t think about a legacy. I think about getting the job done as well as I can, and you and history and other people will take care of the rest of it.”

But he does reflect on the past. “You know, obviously, losing the presidency is not the option of first choice,” he says and laughs, as if awed by the memory. “But you can’t get lost in it. I said, ‘I am not going to make this the defining moment of a life of involvement in public service and caring about things.’ I was a senator and had a lot I was interested in; I have a great family, a great life, and I have nothing to complain about. So I went right back in and started kicking. . . .

“I love it, I really enjoy this job, it’s a great job,” he continues. “And I am excited. Look, we got the deal on chemical weapons [in Syria]; we’ve got Iran talking. We’ve got the Middle East people talking—we’ve made a lot of progress there, and I believe we’ll get back to talking.” He cocks his head pointedly, with a faint smile. “I am not finished.”

The Hill blog: Briefing Room: “Priebus: GOP women worth 'bragging' about”

By Kevin Cirilli

October 2, 2014, 10:59 a.m. EDT

Republican National Committee Chairman Reince Priebus said Thursday that his party is making gains among women voters, but it needs to do more "bragging" about the women in its own ranks.

During a panel at George Washington University, Priebus praised GOP leaders like Sen. Kelly Ayotte (N.H.), South Carolina Gov. Nikki Haley and Rep. Shelley Moore Capito (W.Va.).

"We do a really bad job bragging about it," he said following his prepared remarks. "As far as putting more women up on the news on Sunday morning and making sure that we're placing people better — I think we've improved on that a lot."

The comments come with former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton presumed to be Democratic frontrunner for president in 2016.

"She doesn't poll as well as you would think with women," Priebus said. "We need to do better [...but] women, as of today, they don't have a sizable advantage in the Democratic Party over the Republican Party, as much as that narrative has sunk in.

Priebus also said the party must shift its strategy in 2016 to focus more on a ground game as opposed just to raising large amounts of money.

"We had become a U-Haul trailer of cash for a presidential nominee," he said of 2012. "That is a loser's strategy."

Priebus said that party can't just "raise a gazillion dollars and hand it off to the presidential nominee" or engage in a "23-debate traveling circus," alluding to the 2012 Republican nominating process. "

You have to be a national party obsessed over mechanics, obsessed over a ground game, over the data game," he said.

Chicago Sun-Times: "Dungeons & Dragons Kickstarter campaign features Hillary Clinton"

By Chad Merda

October 2, 2014, 10:42 a.m. EDT

Here are three things that don't normally go together: Hillary Clinton, Kickstarter and Dungeons & Dragons.

For now, they do because one group wants to raise money to hire Clinton to speak and "help us bring our fantasy world to life."

The only problem for the Dungeons & Dragons group from New York? They don't have $200,000, which is what Clinton's reportedly paid to speak. So naturally, they're turning to Kickstarter to help and have launched a fundraising campaign called "Hillary Clinton: The Ultimate Adventure."

So far, they're off to a slow start, with a little more than $200 pledged.

"Everyone can benefit from Hillary's legendary political savvy and top-notch oratory skills. Especially gamers," writes Jared Logan, who started the effort.

And really, it's all about the D-word.

"By achieving this goal, we will prove that a democracy is for the people and by the people," Logan writes. "We will show that even the most disenfranchised and oppressed group in this country (tabletop roleplayers) can still access our nation's leaders and speak to them face to face."

And if by some small miracle they not only raise the money, but manage to lure Clinton to New York, she'll have to forgo the large venue she's accustomed to — and maybe even duck to avoid hitting her head on some low beams and exposed plumbing.

Why? Because she'd be speaking for an hour, "in Eric's Dad's basement in Greenpoint, Brooklyn."

FIRST READ: GOP PRESIDENTIAL HOPEFULS MOSTLY SILENT ON DRONE MISTAKE

First Read is a morning briefing from Meet the Press and the NBC Political Unit on the day's most important political stories and why they matter.

The Sound of Silence (Almost) From the '16 Candidates on Drone Deaths

If you've been following American politics over the last six years, President Obama could sneeze, and it would produce a flurry of negative statements and reactions from his political opponents. That's what makes yesterday's silence -- or backtracking -- from Republican 2016 presidential candidates regarding the accidental drone killing of two hostages so striking. As the Wall Street Journal writes, some Republican 2016ers chose not to comment on yesterday's news (Jeb Bush, Scott Walker), while two others who staged a 2013 filibuster against U.S. drone policy had no stomach to protest it (Rand Paul and Ted Cruz). "It is a tragedy that these hostages lost their lives," Paul said in a brief statement, per the Journal . "My prayers and thoughts are with their families." Cruz called for investigation into the deaths, but added: "Make no mistake: responsibility for their deaths lies firmly and unequivocally with the terrorists who kidnapped them and forcibly held them in their command center."

But it's a conversation and debate worth having

Meanwhile, Lindsey Graham -- a hawkish supporter of U.S. intervention overseas -- said, "Collateral damage is part of war. I've got no problem at all with anything that happened, other than my deepest sympathies for those who were held by al Qaeda that became collateral damage." And Marco Rubio added, "We are all safer because of the actions taken every day around the world by our government to go after those who wish Americans harm and to prevent future attacks against us here at home." But what's amazing is that an issue that sparks so much political debate -- Should drones be used in these kinds of operations? What about against American citizens, even those with al Qaeda ties? Should there be more checks and balances? -- the 2016ers essentially punted. These are ALL questions American voters should get answers from the people vying to become the next commander-in-chief. But no one was comfortable having that conversation yesterday. It's a reminder of just how unprepared many of these campaigns are to debate some of the true heavy issues out there.

The Clinton campaign strikes back

Hours after the New York Times reported on a Canadian mining company -- whose principals donated heavily to the Clinton Foundation over the years -- sold its uranium business to Russia (which had to be approved by Hillary Clinton's State Department), the Clinton campaign struck back at the newspaper. It issued these rebuttals to attempt to knock down any quid-pro-quo:

1. Hillary wasn't involved in the State Department's review; it is the assistant secretary of state for economic, energy, and business affairs who makes the call;
2. The main Clinton Foundation donor, Frank Giustra, sold his stake in the Canadian mine business in 2007, so before Hillary became secretary of state;
3. The State Department was one of nine U.S. agencies to review the sale.

Indeed, upon reflection, that Times article doesn't hold up that well 24 hours after its publication. But if there's a legitimate criticism of the Clintons here -- especially when it comes to the other articles about the Clinton Foundation and Bill's speaking fees (here and here) -- it's that they were sloppy, bordering on being greedy. As Jonathan Chait writes . "All sorts of unproven worst-case-scenario questions float around the web of connections between Bill's private work, Hillary Clinton's public role as secretary of State, the Clintons' quasi-public charity... But the best-case scenario is bad enough: The Clintons have been disorganized and greedy." Just a reminder: Going after the Clintons on personal money and appearances of conflict of interest was a successful message for candidate Barack Obama in 2007-2008.

Why Ted Cruz skipped the Loretta Lynch vote

He had to catch a flight to a Texas fundraiser: Ted Cruz, who was one of the most vocal critics against Loretta Lynch's nomination for Attorney General, was the only senator to miss her final confirmation vote today because he needed to catch a flight for a previously scheduled commitment in Texas, his campaign told NBC's Kelly O'Donnell and Frank Thorp. "He had to catch a flight for a commitment in Texas," Cruz campaign spokeswoman Catherine Frazier said. According to a fundraising invite obtained by Real Clear Politics , Cruz has a fundraiser in Dallas, TX scheduled for 6:00 pm. Cruz spoke on the Senate floor Thursday morning against Lynch's nomination, and then voted against the procedural vote to move forward with consideration of her nomination, something called "cloture." But Cruz missed the actual vote on Lynch's nomination.

Saturday's two GOP cattle calls

Saturday brings two GOP cattle calls. One is the Iowa Faith & Freedom Coalition spring kick-off, featuring nine 2016ers -- Cruz, Fiorina, Huckabee, Jindal, Paul, Perry, Rubio, Santorum, and Walker. And the other one is the Republican Jewish Coalition confab in Las Vegas, which will also hear from Cruz and Perry, as well as George W. Bush, John Boehner, and Mitt Romney.

FIRST READ: MONEY-IN-POLITICS STORIES TO WATCH FOR 2016

First Read is a morning briefing from Meet the Press and the NBC Political Unit on the day's most important political stories and why they matter.

Two other money-in-politics stories to watch in the 2016 race

With all the attention on the Clinton Foundation story -- and with its potential conflicts of interest (see our piece on it yesterday) -- there are two other money-in-politics that should be on everyone's radar screens:

1. The Koch and Adelson Primaries: On Monday, the NYT reported that the Koch Brothers had settled on their preferred 2016 candidate - Scott Walker. Then Koch World pushed back on that story, saying they are still holding auditions for their favorite 2016 candidate. But here is a key question: If the Koch Brothers (and their network of wealthy donors) are going to dole out millions and millions of dollars and they're currently auditioning candidates, what are they getting in return for that support? Check out this quote from Charles Koch: "We're telling [GOP candidates] that if they want our support, one way to get it is articulating a good message to help Americans get a better understanding and a better appreciation of how certain policies ... will benefit them and will benefit all America." What policies are those? Here's NBC's Leigh Ann Caldwell on Scott Walker's ties to the Koch Brothers.

And it's just not the Koch Primary. This coming Saturday, at least two Republican presidential contenders -- Ted Cruz and Rick Perry -- are going to Las Vegas to speak at the Sheldon Adelson-backed Republican Jewish Coalition confab. In the 2012 cycle, Adelson and his wife donated nearly $100 million to GOP outside groups, including Super PACs supporting Newt Gingrich and Mitt Romney.

2. Jeb Bush in uncharted Super PAC waters: On Tuesday, the AP reported that Jeb Bush plans to outsource his TV ads, direct mail, and data gathering to his Super PAC, Right to Rise. What's noteworthy here is that, according to campaign-finance laws, there is supposed to be NO coordination between a candidate and a Super PAC. But Jeb Bush is exploiting a loophole -- and potentially violating at least the SPIRIT of these laws -- because he's not officially a presidential candidate. So he's raising money for this Super PAC and putting his key personnel there. The moment he declares his candidacy (in June?), he'll stop his role with the Super PAC. But by then, it will have all the money (through unlimited donations) and infrastructure it needs.

Bank on it: The Super PACs will outspend the campaigns -- at least during the primary season

When it comes to Jeb Bush's Super PAC, maybe the biggest consequence of it is that, in 2016, we're going to see the Super PACs outspend the actual campaigns, at least during the primary season. As the New York Times' Nick Confessore points out, the Romney campaign spent about $76 million in the 2012 primary season, while the main pro-Romney Super PAC spent $49 million. As Confessore mused, it's easy to see how that ratio shifts for Jeb Bush -- and perhaps the other GOP candidates as well.

Obama visits Florida Everglades to mark Earth Day

USA Today : "President Obama spends Earth Day on Wednesday in the Florida Everglades, promoting his climate change policies. After touring Everglades National Park in the afternoon, Obama will speak 'on the threat that climate change poses to our economy and to the world,' says the White House schedule. The president will stress his efforts to reduce carbon emissions, while criticizing congressional Republicans for opposing his environmental policies." Obama delivers his remarks at 3:55 pm ET.

Hillary vague on trade deal

Turning back to the 2016 race, Hillary Clinton was incredibly vague when talking about the political fight over the Trans-Pacific Partnership (TPP) trade deal. "Any trade deal has to produce jobs and raise wages and increase prosperity and protect our security," she said in New Hampshire yesterday. "And we need to do our part to make sure we have the capacity and the skills to be competitive." As we've written before, this trade deal -- as well as a battle over "fast-track" trade authority for President Obama -- puts Hillary in a tough spot. Does she back Obama and her husband Bill? Or does she side with organized labor, as well as the likes of Martin O'Malley and Bernie Sanders, who have come out against it? Other questions: Will Hillary be able to look credible if she opposes the TPP? Would it add to a perception she'll say or do anything? Could the better position for her actually be supporting it, showing that she's willing to buck her base (especially since Obama is for it)? Also on the trade-deal front, here's a Wall Street Journal op-ed by Paul Ryan and Ted Cruz supporting giving Obama fast-track authority.

Walker comes out against LEGAL immigration?

Don't miss this piece by MSNBC's Benjy Sarlin : "Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker's newfound skepticism of legal immigration levels is a potential turning point in the still nascent presidential race, potentially dragging the Republican Party further to the right than Mitt Romney's hardline immigration platform in 2012. 'In terms of legal immigration, how we need to approach that going forward is saying - the next president and the next Congress need to make decisions about a legal immigration system that's based on, first and foremost, on protecting American workers and American wages,' Walker said Monday in an interview with Glenn Beck. 'It is a fundamentally lost issue by many in elected positions today - what is this doing for American workers looking for jobs, what is this doing to wages, and we need to have that be at the forefront of our discussion going forward.'" A Walker spokeswoman told the Washington Examiner's Philip Klein: "Gov. Walker supports American workers' wages and the U.S. economy and thinks both should be considered when crafting a policy for legal immigration. He strongly supports legal immigration, and like many Americans, believes that our economic situation should be considered instead of arbitrary caps on the amount of immigrants that can enter."

FIRST READ'S MORNING CLIPS

OBAMA AGENDA: The latest in Yemen

The New York Times : "Warplanes from a Saudi-led military coalition conducted airstrikes in the southwestern Yemeni city of Taiz on Wednesday, hours after Saudi officials had announced they were halting their nearly monthlong bombing campaign against the Houthi rebel movement. The warplanes bombed Houthi positions during heavy clashes in Taiz on Wednesday morning, according to a local official in the city. The new airstrikes, combined with reports of continued fighting in other parts of the country, including the southern port city of Aden, dampened hopes that the Saudi announcement would quickly result in a broader cease-fire."

CLINTON: From the Associated Press , on Bill Clinton's role: "Aides say the ex-president will stay behind the scenes initially and that Hillary Clinton's focus on her parents and grandchild allow her to fill in other aspects of her biography. Invoking Bill Clinton, who has high approval ratings, also can bring up positives from his administration, such as a strong economy, but at the risk of revisiting the Monica Lewinsky scandal and subsequent impeachment drama."

FIRST READ: WHAT YOU NEED TO KNOW ABOUT THE CLINTON FOUNDATION STORY

First Read is a morning briefing from Meet the Press and the NBC Political Unit on the day's most important political stories and why they matter.

Everything you wanted to know about the Clinton Foundation-money story but were afraid to ask

With the Clinton Foundation's fundraising practices once again in the news as Hillary Clinton runs for president -- especially with a new controversial book on the subject -- here are the basics of what you need to know:

- ORIGINAL CONCERN ABOUT CONFLICTS OF INTEREST

At Hillary Clinton's Jan. 13, 2009 confirmation hearing to be secretary of state, then-Sen. Dick Lugar (R-IN) summed up the potential conflict of interest between the Clinton Foundation receiving donations from foreign countries and Clinton's new job. "The core of the problem is that foreign governments and entities may perceive the Clinton Foundation as a means to gain favor with the secretary of state. Although neither Senator Clinton nor President Clinton has a personal financial stake in the foundation, obviously its work benefits their legacy and their public service priorities."

Hillary Clinton agreed about the perception problem. "[T]he foundation and the president-elect decided to go beyond what the law and the ethics rules call for to address even the appearance of conflict and that is why they signed a memorandum of understanding, which outlines the voluntary steps that the foundation is taking to address potential concerns that might come up down the road."

- THE MEMO OF UNDERSTANDING

The "Memo of Understanding" that Hillary Clinton reached with the Obama administration had two main objectives:

-- to prohibit President Clinton from soliciting funds or accepting foreign-government contributions to the Clinton Global Initiative (CGI);

-- to disclose foreign countries that INCREASED their commitments to all Clinton Foundation entities, or that became a NEW contributor

(The memo of understanding was signed by Valerie Jarrett and Bruce Lindsey of the Clinton Foundation. It also was under supervision by John Kerry and Dick Lugar of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- THE 2010 ALGERIA DONATION

In Feb. 2015, we learned that the Clinton Foundation FAILED TO DISCLOSE a $500,000 donation in 2010 to assist with earthquake relief in Haiti. This was a NEW donation, and thus should have been disclosed to the State Department.

The Clinton Foundation issued a statement saying that the donation SHOULD have been disclosed. "Immediately following the devastating earthquake in Haiti on January 12, 2010, the Embassy of Algeria made an unsolicited donation of $500K to Clinton Foundation Haiti Relief fund. As the Clinton Foundation did with all donations it received for earthquake relief, the entire amount of Algeria's contribution was distributed as aid in Haiti. This donation was disclosed publicly on our website, however, the State Department should have also been formally informed. This was a one-time, specific donation to help Haiti and Algeria had not donated to the Clinton Foundation before and has not since."

- CURRENT POLICY NOW THAT THE CLINTON CAMPAIGN IS UNDERWAY

The Clinton Foundation is no longer accepting new donations from foreign governments. But it is still CONTINUING existing programs that were up and running before Hillary began her campaign. There are six countries that had EXISTING programs -- Australia, Canada, Germany, the Netherlands, Norway, and the U.K. As a Clinton Foundation official tells NBC News, "You just can't pull the plug" on existing programs, especially when they involve multi-year grants.

Also under current policy, all disclosures will be listed quarterly instead of yearly (as was the case under the older Memo of Understanding). And after the Clinton Global Initiative completes its already-planned Morocco conference, it will no longer have foreign countries sponsor or co-sponsor CGI events.

Hillary's Day 2 in New Hampshire

Hillary Clinton has a 10:20 am ET event in Concord, NH, where she'll focus on community college programs.

On the trail

Chris Christie speaks at the Washington Conference on the Americas at 12:25 pm ET... Carly Fiorina has events in Council Bluffs, Sioux City and Denison, IA... And former President Bill Clinton gives an address on public service at Georgetown University at 10:30 am ET.

A breakthrough on Loretta Lynch and the anti-trafficking bill?

It looks that way. Politico : "The Senate is nearing a resolution to a monthlong dispute that's halted a human trafficking bill and confirmation of attorney general nominee Loretta Lynch, even as Minority Leader Harry Reid on Monday resumed his rhetorical assault on Republicans for the delay." More: "Top sources in both parties - and even Reid himself - said negotiators had made headway toward a compromise on abortion language included in the sex trafficking bill that Democrats have strongly opposed. Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) has vowed that the trafficking bill must be completed before the Senate votes to confirm Lynch."

Yet ANOTHER Republican says no to running for FL SEN

This is getting weirder and weirder. "Two weeks after floating the idea of a 2016 run for U.S. Senate, Rep. Tom Rooney, R-Okeechobee, said today he has decided against seeking the seat Sen. Marco Rubio is giving up to run for president," the Palm Beach Post writes . "'For the last several days I considered running for the U.S. Senate representing the great state of Florida. While I feel like I could mount a successful statewide campaign, the toll I believe the process would take on my family is something I cannot put them through,' Rooney said in a statement released by his office."

FIRST READ'S MORNING CLIPS

OFF TO THE RACES: Jeb to rely heavily on Super PAC

BUSH: The AP reports that he will delegate a lot of his campaign tasks - like advertising, direct mail, and data gathering - to his Super PAC. More: "The architects of the plan believe the super PAC's ability to legally raise unlimited amounts of money outweighs its primary disadvantage, that it cannot legally coordinate its actions with Bush or his would-be campaign staff."

CHRISTIE: More bad news for the NJ gov, from the Washington Post : "New Jersey state Sen. Joseph M. Kyrillos, who chaired Christie's 2009 gubernatorial campaign and ushered his agenda through a Democratic-controlled legislature, is backing former Florida governor Jeb Bush's all-but-certain presidential bid."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He has hired an Iowa political director for his PAC, reports the Des Moines Register.

Bloomberg writes that Christie is hoping (again) to jumpstart his flagging presidential hopes with a speech in DC.

CLINTON: The New York Times digs into how Hillary Clinton is working to embrace Elizabeth Warren's populist rhetoric. And/but: "Nothing stings her inner circle more than the suggestion that their candidate is late to these issues. Mrs. Clinton was the original Elizabeth Warren, her advisers say, a populist fighter who for decades has been an advocate for families and children; only now have the party and primary voters caught up."

The Wall Street Journal writes on how Mayor Rahm Emanuel's run-off victory in Chicago could provide lessons for Clinton.

Yesterday in New Hampshire, she said she's "ready" for Republican attacks.

WMUR previews her community college pitch today.

WALKER: The New York Times writes that David Koch has been indicating that Scott Walker is his favorite Republican candidate.

FLORIDA: Republican Tom Rooney says he won't seek Marco Rubio's Senate seat.

NEVADA: Gov. Brian Sandoval is confusing some folks in his own party, writes the Wall Street Journal.

VIRGINIA: Former First Lady Maureen McDonnell is hoping to get her public corruption convictions tossed out.

OBAMA AGENDA: Deploying the USS Theodore Roosevelt

From the AP : "In a stepped-up response to Iranian backing of Shiite rebels in Yemen, the Navy aircraft carrier USS Theodore Roosevelt is steaming toward the waters off Yemen to beef up security and join other American ships that are prepared to intercept any Iranian vessels carrying weapons to the Houthi rebels."

An Egyptian court has sentenced former president Mohammed Morsi to 20 years in prison for charges of inciting violence.

The Baltimore Sun has the latest on the death of Freddie Gray, a 25 year-old black man who suffered a spinal injury while in police custody.

CONGRESS: Business vs. Labor on trade

The Hill writes that business and labor groups are back in their corners as they battle over trade legislation.

The New York Times writes that Congress is pushing forward on Obama's agenda, even as the Hill is now dominated by the GOP.

It's still not clear when Loretta Lynch will get her confirmation vote.

John McCain and Ted Cruz are in a bit of a dust-up over the possibility of hearings on troops carrying personal firearms on military installations.

It looks like Capitol Police Chief Kim Dine is staying on after all, Roll Call reports.

Lincoln Chafee on CNN's New Day

http://mms.tveyes.com/ClipEditor.aspx?hl=&StationID=100&ClipDateTime=04/16/2015+08:07:00

(8:07a) Chris Cuomo: Lincoln Chafee joins us right now. He was a former senator and governor from Rhode Island and he is weighing a run for president. Good to have you with us, governor.

Chafee: Thank you very much for having me on the show.

Cuomo: So let's ask the obvious question: Do you think you can beat Hillary Clinton and why?

Chafee: I have been in 12 elections in my career over 30 years, and I've gotten into every one expecting to win. I have won 10 of the 12, but you always get in expecting to win, and elections should be about choices, and so you said on the Republican side there seem to be a lot of choices; there should be choices on the Democrat side also.

John Berman: So here's the thing, you were actually a big supporter, you went out on a limb supporting President Obama when he was running for re-election. At the time you were an independent and I think you even supported him as a Republican or at least considered it as a Republican.

Chafee: no, as an independent.

Berman: Oh, as an independent. So look, a lot of people are looking at Hillary Clinton right now as a third term for President Obama. You, by exploring a run, are not so indirectly saying, no, no, no, she does not represent the third term here. Why not?

(8:08) Chafee: well, don't forget, that the reason -- probably the biggest reason that senator Obama at the time defeated Hillary Clinton in '08 was because of the Iraq war vote. That was the issue and that's my big issue here, because we are dealing with ramifications in a huge mistake that Senator Clinton made in 2002, which i did not make, but we live with it today—everyone says well that's 12 years ago, but we live with it today-- even the news today in Ramadi, what's happening in Ramadi with ISIS. And so it's a huge, bad decision, and so i don't consider it a third term for President Obama at all. Very, very different.

Cuomo: You also have and interesting connection here. You were in boarding school with Jeb Bush, is that right?

Chafee: yes.

Cuomo: So, do you believe he would be a better president than Hillary Clinton?

(8:09a) Chafee: I am running my own race on the Democratic side and i will let the Republicans sort out their primaries.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Berman: You actually are running a race though on the Democratic side. You haven't declared yet, no one's declared but Hillary on the Democratic side, and the other folks who are considering a run, Bernie Sanders, Jim Webb, Martin O'Malley- no one is taking on Hillary Clinton. No one has gone out nearly as far as you have gone out to criticize her, and you are criticizing her saying that a vote that she took in the Senate, when you were in the Senate, is essentially disqualifying for the Democratic nomination.

Chafee: Yes that's why I'm running, because I feel strongly about where we're going as a country, so it's not only that vote, but also her actions of Secretary of State, and where we're going---

Cuomo: What did she do wrong? What'd she do wrong as Secretary of State?

Chafee: Well first of all start with Russia. Right in the early days of her tenure as Secretary of State, they tried to re-start with Russia and she presented the Russian foreign minister with a re-start button, but they got the Russian word wrong, and instead the Russians looked at it and said this means over charge, and it was an insult.

Cuomo: I mean, the re-start was the right move or the wrong move?

(8:10) Chafee: It was the right move to re-start, but you got to get the word right. They insulted the Russians right off the bat and we live with the ramifications again today. Look what is happening with Putin and with Russia, Ukraine, and selling arms to Iran. It all could have started with that diplomatic mistake, getting the word wrong. And also, as Secretary of State, she referred to the elected leader of Venezuela, Hugo Chavez at the time, as a dictator, and that just sets back our relations with an important country, an oil-rich country. So it's a succession of mistakes- mistake on the Iraq war vote, poor tenure as Secretary of State. We need a new direction; fresh ideas for where we're going as a country.

Berman: It sounds like you've really gone through her record kind of with a fine-toothed comb here looking for specific examples. What about the now, and the e-mails, what about the funds for the Clinton global initiative, and what level of concern is this to you?

(8:11) Chafee: Especially the funds coming into the Clinton funds from other countries, while she is Secretary of State. Huge amounts of money coming from these foreign countries into the Clinton fund while she is Secretary of State.

Berman: Did they change the rules while she was Secretary and then afterwards start accepting from other countries like Saudi Arabia and what not?

Chafee: And Libya. I don't know when they changed the rules, John.

Chafee: Yes, and i feel strongly my record as a mayor, as a governor, as a United States senator is open to scrutiny and i have a strong record of standing up for the people and being a peace maker with unions, and as a Senator dealing with other countries on the foreign relations committee, so I look forward to a new direction; fresh ideas for America, i firmly believe, for our children and grandchildren.

Berman: You have a unique perspective, you've been a Republican, you were an independent, you were a Democrat. There's so much gridlock in Washington and around the country right now and you've had a perspective from every different angle. Who is the most to blame? Who needs to do more to correct their actions here to fix this problem?

(8:12) Chafee: Well President Bush the second, George W. Bush really set this country back, i believe. First the tax cuts that gave us the depression, and then the war in Iraq, and a record of prevarication. Just saying one thing as a candidate and then doing something else. Even Scott McClellan, his press secretary, said it was a culture of prevarication. So, I'd give a lot of blame to Republicans, which I was at the time and one of the big reasons i left. To take a surplus, turn it into deficits; to take a peaceful world, turn it into a chaotic world- that's on the Republican watch.

(8:13) Cuomo: John is taking one tack on your changing parties. The way you are going to hear it from your adversaries is, that is the biggest sin in politics that there is. This man, the governor did not just go from one party to another, he changed twice…They are going to bang you over the head with that all day. This guy doesn't know who he is, he doesn't know where he stands, he went from a Republican to an independent to a Democrat, we need leadership that is direct and secure.

Chafee: The flaw in that argument is that i have a 30-year record to look at, and when they look at that 30-year record they're going to see absolute consistency, on fiscal responsibility, on the environment, on using the tools of government the less fortunate, on keeping us out of quagmires, on civil liberties, on a number of issues, rock-solid consistency.

Berman: You are saying a reverse Ronald Reagan, I did not leave the Democratic Party the Democratic Party left me?

Chafee: yeah, There's no room for liberal Republicans in the Republican Party. I got primary'd in my reelection for Senate in 2006 by the right wing- I won it, but it cost me the general. That's what is happening, they primary the liberal Republicans.

(8:14) Cuomo: You think the DNC will let you have a fair shot?

Chafee: I do. i do. Elections are about choices. They should be. That's America.

Cuomo: You think you can raise the money?

Chafee: America loves an underdog. No doubt i am an underdog. I'm not going to raise a billion dollars, I don't think I can raise a billion dollars.

Berman: Governor, Senator, Lincoln Chafee. Thank you so much for being with us. Really appreciate you being here today.

Chafee: Thank you John.

Subject: So What if Iran Got Nuclear Weapons?..by Uri Avnery from Tel Aviv

vered by salsa

Editor's Note: This thought experiment by Uri Avnery raises an important question for all those who are driven by fear of Iran having nuclear weapons, a fear that seems to increase precisely when Iran is negotiating a path to assure the West that it will not use its nuclear capacities to develop such a bomb. Uri Anveri, leader of the Israeli peace movement Gush Shalom, imagines the situation if the worst fears were true and this whole deal was a way to fool the West while Iran secretly developed its nuclear weapons. O.K. imagine if Iran had nuclear weapons. So what? His reasoning reminds us of how the West managed to marginalize those who called for an assault on Stalinist Russia once it had nuclear weapons. More rational voices prevailed, despite the fact that Stalinist dictators and their supporters repeated the mantra that Russia would "bury" the West, and despite the fact that Russia then provided arms and political support for North Vietnam which the US was fighting in a ground war, and supported "subversion" of capitalist-oriented regimes around the world. We learned to live with it. So instead of war, we had a Cold War--and eventually a not so cold war, and then the Soviet Union collapsed. The same people who brought us to war in Iraq because of the allegations that Saddam Hussein had nuclear weapons are now calling for a similar war with Iran. Iran's response: "we'll open our country to every possible inspection, because we are not developing nuclear weapons, only nuclear power for peaceful purposes." Don't believe them? Well, that's where Uri Avnery's argument starts: let's assume that they did develop nuclear weapons, he says, so what? It's an important thought experiment.--Rabbi Michael Lerner

Who's Afraid of the Big Bad Bomb?

by Uri Avnery, Tel Aviv, Israel

I MUST start with a shocking confession: I am not afraid of the Iranian nuclear bomb.

I know that this makes me an abnormal person, almost a freak.

But what can I do? I am unable to work up fear, like a real Israeli. Try as I may, the Iranian bomb does not make me hysterical.

MY FATHER once taught me how to withstand blackmail: imagine that the awful threat of the blackmailer has already come about. Then you can tell him: Go to hell.

I have tried many times to follow this advice and found it sound. So now I apply it to the Iranian bomb: I imagine that the worst has already happened: the awful ayatollahs have got the bombs that can eradicate little Israel in a minute.

So what?

According to foreign experts, Israel has several hundred nuclear bombs (assessments vary between 80-400. If Iran sends its bombs and obliterates most of Israel (myself included), Israeli submarines will obliterate Iran. Whatever I might think about Binyamin Netanyahu, I rely on him and our security chiefs to keep our "second strike" capability intact. Just last week we were informed that Germany had delivered another state-of-the-art submarine to our navy for this purpose.

Israeli idiots – and there are some around – respond: "Yes, but the Iranian leaders are not normal people. They are madmen. Religious fanatics. They will risk the total destruction of Iran just to destroy the Zionist state. Like exchanging queens in chess."

Such convictions are the outcome of decades of demonizing. Iranians – or at least their leaders – are seen as subhuman miscreants.

Reality shows us that the leaders of Iran are very sober, very calculating politicians. Cautious merchants in the Iranian bazaar style. They don't take unnecessary risks. The revolutionary fervor of the early Khomeini days is long past, and even Khomeini would not have dreamt of doing anything so close to national suicide.

ACCORDING TO the Bible, the great Persian king Cyrus allowed the captive Jews of Babylon to return to Jerusalem and rebuild their temple. At that time, Persia was already an ancient civilization – both cultural and political.

After the "return from Babylon", the Jewish commonwealth around Jerusalem lived for 200 years under Persian suzerainty. I was taught in school that these were happy years for the Jews.

Since then, Persian culture and history has lived through another two and a half millennia. Persian civilization is one of the oldest in the world. It has created a great religion and influenced many others, including Judaism. Iranians are fiercely proud of that civilization.

To imagine that the present leaders of Iran would even contemplate risking the very existence of Persia out of hatred of Israel is both ridiculous and megalomaniac.

Moreover, throughout history, relations between Jews and Persians have almost always been excellent. When Israel was founded, Iran was considered a natural ally, part of David Ben-Gurion's "strategy of the periphery" – an alliance with all the countries surrounding the Arab world.

The Shah, who was re-installed by the American and British secret services, was a very close ally. Teheran was full of Israeli businessmen and military advisers. It served as a base for the Israeli agents working with the rebellious Kurds in northern Iraq who were fighting against the regime of Saddam Hussein.

After the Islamic revolution, Israel still supported Iran against Iraq in their cruel 8-year war. The notorious Irangate affair, in which my friend Amiram Nir and Oliver North played such an important role, would not have been possible without the old Iranian-Israeli ties.

Even now, Iran and Israel are conducting amiable arbitration proceedings about an old venture: the Eilat-Ashkelon oil pipeline built jointly by the two countries.

If the worst comes to the worst, nuclear Israel and nuclear Iran will live in a Balance of Terror.

Highly unpleasant, indeed. But not an existential menace.

HOWEVER, FOR those who live in terror of the Iranian nuclear capabilities, I have a piece of advice: use the time we still have.

Under the American-Iranian deal, we have at least 10 years before Iran could start the final phase of producing the bomb.

Please use this time for making peace.

The Iranian hatred of the "Zionist Regime" – the State of Israel – derives from the fate of the Palestinian people. The feeling of solidarity for the helpless Palestinians is deeply ingrained in all Islamic peoples. It is part of the popular culture in all of them. It is quite real, even if the political regimes misuse, manipulate or ignore it.

Since there is no ground for a specific Iranian hatred of Israel, it is solely based on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. No conflict, no enmity.

Logic tells us: if we have several years before we have to live in the shadow of an Iranian nuclear bomb, let's use this time to eliminate the conflict. Once the Palestinians themselves declare that they consider the historic conflict with Israel settled, no Iranian leadership will be able to rouse its people against us.

FOR SEVERAL weeks now, Netanyahu has been priding himself publicly on a huge, indeed historic, achievement.

For the first time ever, Israel is practically part of an Arab alliance.

Throughout the region, the conflict between Muslim Sunnis and Muslim Shiites is raging. The Shiite camp, headed by Iran, includes the Shiites in Iraq, Hezbollah in Lebanon and the Houthis in Yemen. (Netanyahu falsely - or out of ignorance - includes the Sunni Hamas in this camp.)

The opposite Sunni camp includes Saudi Arabia, Egypt and the Gulf states. Netanyahu hints that Israel is now secretly accepted by them as a member.

It is a very untidy picture. Iran is fighting against the Islamic State in Syria and Iraq, which is a mortal enemy of Israel. Iran is supporting the Assad regime in Damascus, which is also supported by Hezbollah, which fights against the Islamic State, while the Saudis support other extreme Sunni Syrians who fight against Assad and the Islamic State. Turkey supports Iran and the Saudis while fighting against Assad. And so on.

I am not enamored with Arab military dictatorships and corrupt monarchies. Frankly, I detest them. But if Israel succeeds in becoming an official member of any Arab coalition, it would be a historic breakthrough, the first in 130 years of Zionist-Arab conflict.

However, all Israeli relations with Arab countries are secret, except those with Egypt and Jordan, and even with these two the contacts are cold and distant, relations between the regimes rather than between the peoples.

Let's face facts: no Arab state will engage in open and close cooperation with Israel before the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is ended. Even kings and dictators cannot afford to do so. The solidarity of their peoples with the oppressed Palestinians is far too profound.

Real peace with the Arab countries is impossible without peace with the Palestinian people, as peace with the Palestinian people is impossible without peace with the Arab countries.

So if there is now a chance to establish official peace with Saudi Arabia and the Gulf States, and to turn the cold peace with Egypt into a real one, Netanyahu should jump at it. The terms of an agreement are already lying on the table: the Saudi peace plan, also called the Arab Initiative, which was adopted many years ago by the entire Arab League. It is based on the two-state solution of the Israeli-Arab conflict.

Netanyahu could amaze the whole world by "doing a de Gaulle" – making peace with the Sunni Arab world (as de Gaulle did with Algeria) which would compel the Shiites to follow suit.

Do I believe in this? I do not. But if God wills it, even a broomstick can shoot.

And on the day of the Jewish Pesach feast, commemorating the (imaginary) exodus from Egypt, we are reminding ourselves that miracles do happen.

CNBC opinion: Shelly Porges: "Empowering women is good for the economy"

By Shelly Porges

September 18, 2014

Last month, the Gujarat state government in India instituted a two-week celebration on the empowerment of women. The celebration quickly subsided when the police took actions more reminiscent of female oppression than empowerment, putting up posters with women dressed in jeans and shorts that read "Do not step out of the house in inappropriate clothing" and urging girls to refrain from using cell phones for no reason whatsoever.

Across the world's economies, women face all kinds of barriers to their empowerment. Two decades after Hillary Clinton's 1994 speech in Beijing where she so famously declared that "women's rights are human rights," the fight continues.

But empowering women is not just the right thing to do. It's the smart thing to do.

This week, powerhouse leaders including Hillary Clinton, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, and Senator Kirsten Gillibrand will come together at a Center for American Progress roundtable to continue the dialogue on women's economic security and empowerment.

Women are an extremely powerful resource for global entrepreneurship and economic development — one that is not currently tapped to its potential. Research has shown that where women are economically empowered, communities and nations thrive.

That is why over the past few years, the conversation has developed into empowering women economically. In 2011, for example, the State Department held the first Asia Pacific Economic Cooperation (APEC) Women and the Economy Summit, a breakthrough forum in San Francisco on the economic empowerment of women where we hosted 21 of the world's economies — including China, Russia, and Indonesia — that represented 55 percent of the world's GDP.

At the forum, Secretary Clinton persuaded the countries to agree to the "San Francisco Declaration" — an agenda to integrate female economic empowerment and entrepreneurship into their economic policies. It declared that the countries "will take concrete actions to realize the full potential of women, integrate them more fully into APEC economies, harness their talents, remove barriers that restrict women's full economic participation, and maximize their contributions towards economic growth."

This was a monumental breakthrough for many of the economies and for the United States, and is just one example of the enormous strides that have been made. But there is more to be done to continue to increase opportunities for women entrepreneurs and to raise their profile to the highest levels.

Each of us can also do our part by:

- Purchasing goods or services from women-owned businesses locally and around the world;
- Supporting organizations that assist women entrepreneurs; and
- Joining angel investment groups like Golden Seeds that invest in women-founded and led enterprises.

The United States recently celebrated Women's Equality Day — let's do more to make every day equal for women everywhere. As Hillary Clinton says, "it is the great unfinished business of the 21st century."

Wall Street Journal op-ed: Bill Burton: "Isolationists vs. Interventionists: The Latest GOP Split"

By Bill Burton, executive vice president and managing director at the Global Strategy Group and a senior fellow at the Center for American Progress

September 18, 2014, 11:22 a.m. EDT

In attacking Hillary Clinton on foreign policy, Republican Sens. Rand Paul and Marco Rubio are doing a pretty good job of underscoring their own differences on isolation versus interventionism. In their estimation, one stance or the other accounts for the rise of Islamic State militants, and either way, Mrs. Clinton is to blame.

Huh?

Mr. Rubio wrote an op-ed recently attacking Mrs. Clinton for being an "isolationist" when it comes to foreign policy. He accuses her of paving the way for the rise of Islamic State by not arming the moderate Syrian opposition.

Mr. Rubio is completely wrong. Mrs. Clinton did in fact advocate for arming the moderate Syrian opposition in order to prevent extremists from taking control. But why take my word for it when his colleague is already pointing out that truth?

In an op-ed a few weeks ago, Mr. Paul said the exact opposite of Sen. Rubio, labeling Mrs. Clinton an "interventionist," and asserting that arming the moderate Syrian opposition would have "created a haven for the Islamic State."

You don't have to read that closely between the lines to see that their attacks weren't only aimed at their straw woman du jour but also at each other. Talk about an elephant in the room.

According to Mr. Rubio, "Members of my own Republican Party have also at times embraced the Democrats' narrative that too much American leadership is the problem, rather than the solution to global instability. Not too long ago, some neo-isolationists even claimed that America has no significant national interest in the conflicts in Syria and Iraq, and that American support for the Syrian opposition fueled the growth of the Islamic State." Hmm, I wonder who he's talking about?

Mr. Paul didn't hold back either in his criticism of the likes of Mr. Rubio: "But the same is true of hawkish members of my own party. Some said it would be 'catastrophic' if we failed to strike Syria. What they were advocating for then—striking down Assad's regime—would have made our current situation even worse, as it would have eliminated the only regional counterweight to the ISI[L] threat."

Regardless of whether the Isolationists or the Interventionists prevail in the GOP civil war, one thing is for sure: The Republican Party is divided more than ever. And, I will remain hopeful that somehow, someday, Republicans will get their act together, join in finding solutions and stop the nonsense and silliness that helps no one.

Hillary Rodham Clinton says voters should turn pay inequity and women's financial security into a political movement this fall.

Clinton says issues like raising the minimum wage, equal pay and providing affordable child care need to be "in the lifeblood" of the upcoming elections.

The former secretary of state is a potential 2016 Democratic presidential candidate. She spoke at a forum sponsored by the Center for American Progress along with House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi and Sens. Kirsten Gillibrand of New York and Patty Murray of Washington state.

Democrats are trying to persuade women to vote in the fall midterm elections as they work to keep their Senate majority. Female voters could hold the key in several competitive Senate races.

NBC News: "Hillary Clinton: Congress Out of Touch on Women's Issues"

By Kasie Hunt

September 18, 2014, 1:14 p.m. EDT

Congress is living in an "evidence-free zone" as it debates issues of equal pay and family-friendly work policies, former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton said Thursday.

"Unfortunately, reality is not always the context in which these decisions are made. The Congress increasingly -- despite the best efforts of my friends and others -- is living in an evidence-free zone," she said during a roundtable discussion at the Center for American Progress focused on women's issues. "What the reality is, in the lives of Americans is so far from the minds of too many who don't place the highest priority" on those issues.

Women are a critical demographic in this year's midterm elections, with Democrats focused on stoking the gender gap particularly in key states like North Carolina and Colorado. Clinton has focused much of her career as first lady, senator and then Secretary of State on issues affecting women and girls.

Clinton made the remarks during a roundtable that also featured Democratic Sens. Kirsten Gillibrand and Patty Murray, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, and Rep. Rosa DeLauro. The potential 2016 presidential candidate said that the glass ceiling isn't the problem for most American women.

"The floor is collapsing--we talk about a glass ceiling? These women don't even have a secure floor under them," Clinton said.

MSNBC: "Conservatives demand Clinton subpoena on Benghazi"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By Alex Seitz-Wald

September 18, 2014, 11:31 a.m. EDT

Less than a day after the House Select Committee on Benghazi held its first hearing, pressure is already mounting on its chairman to subpoena Hillary Clinton, who was secretary of state during the 2012 terror attack and is considering a presidential run in 2016.

On Thursday morning, the anti-Clinton Stop Hillary PAC delivered to South Carolina Republican Rep. Trey Gowdy more than 120,000 signatures from supporters who want the former first lady to testify under oath, a day after the same group started running $100,000 worth of advertising attacking Clinton on Benghazi in key presidential states.

The petition is in the form of a faux subpoena, issued to Clinton, from Stop Hillary PAC's Honorary Chairman Ted Harvey. "On behalf of the AMERICAN PEOPLE," Harvey, a Colorado state senator, writes, "This subpoena is issued by the undersigned citizens in support for Rep. Trey Gowdy and the Benghazi Select Committee. You MUST agree to appear [under oath]," the letter states.

That's on top of another roughly 98,000 signatures on a petition from the group supporting Gowdy, which were also deliveredThursday.

"Over the past few months 264,220 supporters from across the country have signed our petition to subpoena Hillary to testify so the truth can be uncovered," Harvey said in a statement to msnbc.

Garrett Marquis, the group's spokesperson noted that the Stop Hillary PAC was the first anti-Hillary PAC to file with the Federal Elections Commission. "We are the leaders in the movement to stop Hillary from becoming President," he said. The group has raised about $1 million and signed up almost 600,000 Americans.

On Tuesday, the super PAC began airing some of the earliest Clinton-themed ads yet, demanding that Clinton testify under oath.

The petitions arrived at the Longworth House Office Building Thursday morning in five boxes holding more than 20,000 pages of printed out petitions.

Security protocols would not allow the boxes to be delivered directly to Gowdy's office, however, so Marquis presented a staffer with two representative petitions and sent the boxes off to be screened by Capitol Police. They'll be delivered to the chairman's office about two weeks later, after clearing screening.

CNN: Hambycast: "Hillary Clinton's madcap media mob"

By Peter Hamby

September 18, 2014

Des Moines, Iowa (CNN) -- If Hillary Clinton decides not to run for president -- and yes, that is still possible -- her return to the media lion's den might be a factor in her thinking.

She's done a national book tour and the paid lecture circuit, but Clinton got an up-close look at today's frenzied political news environment last weekend when she visited Iowa for the first time in seven years, a spectacle primed for an avalanche of media coverage given her expected campaign and her tortured history with the Hawkeye State.

I joined more than 200 other reporters who swarmed the scene and tweeted away, even though most Americans on social media that day probably cared more about Robert Griffin's ankle.

The press scrum that assembled to witness noncandidates Hillary and Bill Clinton flip Hy-Vee steaks with Sen. Tom Harkin -- behind a barricade, of course -- was as large, if not larger, than the media hordes that covered her at the height of her 2008 campaign.

One reporter got whacked in the head with the butt of a big television camera. Another photographer dramatically toppled off his ladder while straining to get a shot. It was a little absurd. When the Clintons approached the media zoo for question time, Bill Clinton leaned in and relished the scene. Hillary kept her distance.

Political Twitter, though, wasn't just a stream of gauzy Instagram-filtered pics of the Clintons: It was also rife with media criticism, some fair and some not, from politicos and press critics who pointed to the event as another example of lazy "pack journalism" with little journalistic upside.

The sniping had some credibility. What was the competitive advantage of being there, just one more reporter among the herd, all of us racing around to get the same quotes and the same pictures?

This was especially true for the many journalists in attendance who rarely travel outside of Washington or New York to cover politics but decided to open up their travel budget for this one trip.

Couldn't their time have been better spent reporting on an undercovered Senate or governor's race in some other part of the country, far away from the rest of the media scrum? Of course, the academics would say. But the incentive structure of today's click-driven news economy begs to differ. Hillary gets eyeballs. Arkansas' Tom Cotton does not. This is the world we live in.

As much as I believe in straying far, far away from the rest of the media pack -- this was a lynchpin argument in "Did Twitter Kill The Boys on the Bus?," the Harvard Kennedy School study I wrote last year about the hyperactive political news media -- I did find value in covering the Steak Fry.

For one, I lived Clinton's 2008 campaign up close as an embedded producer for CNN, living on her campaign plane for six months and ingesting every single stump speech, gaffe and gross turkey sandwich in front of me. It was useful for me to see whether her political skills and her willingness to play the Iowa game had shifted since she lost the nomination fight to Barack Obama.

The whole thing was broadcast on CNN and C-SPAN, which is fine and good, but television cameras don't pick up the small things reporters can sniff on the ground: The receptiveness of the crowd, the impressive organizational prowess of the once-meager Ready for Hillary super PAC, the absurdity of the staged photo-ops and press scrums, and the rope-line body language of Clinton herself, which was noticeably more cautious than her husband Bill (some things never change).

Those are the kind of atmospherics I chose to focus on when crafting my report from the scene as well as this week's episode of Hambycast.

And of course, there's the reporting that went on nowhere near the Steak Fry, those meetings with Democrat and Republican sources in and around Des Moines. Was all that worth the plane ticket to DSM? Definitely. Will I go somewhere where other reporters aren't for my next trip? You bet.

Watching the Iowa theatrics from afar, the journalist Dave Weigel wrote that Hillary's protocandidacy is a "problem for the media, which simultaneously is ready right now to cover her like a nominee -- 200 reporters! -- and yet so palpably bored with how she talks, and runs."

But the ever-growing press corps, weaponized by Twitter, will also be a problem for Clinton and her team, who must find ways of engaging with a massive entourage of reporters that is constantly on the hunt for "news" -- i.e., anything off-message or click-worthy -- while also trying to drive the conversation on their own terms.

The hyperguarded Mitt Romney encountered this same dilemma during his ill-fated 2012 presidential bid.

When he avoided the press, he got punished by a cranky and access-starved press corps. When he held a rare press conference to push a policy idea, his comments were drowned out by a cacophony of horse-race questions or some Twitter-driven "controversy" unfolding hundreds of miles away.

So he chose to get his message out on his own terms, through paid media or friendly Fox News interviews, without the filter of the "traditional" press, whatever that means. In the end, it wasn't enough.

That political reporters are motivated by conflict, personality and the ups-and-downs of a campaign is nothing new, and it's unlikely to change despite carping from media critics.

What has changed is the atomized and hyperactive social news environment we all live in now, and it's changed dramatically since Clinton last announced a presidential bid in 2007, before the iPhone existed and well before Twitter took hold among the political class.

If she runs again, there will be reporters covering her campaign who were barely in diapers when Bill Clinton was elected President, who came of age in an era of Internet journalism that prizes exclusives and micronews, who have very different incentives than the television and newspaper reporters that the Clintons dealt with during his presidency or her last campaign. They hold the Clintons in high-regard, but not nearly as high as the regard the Clintons have for themselves.

Hillary got a taste of this during her book tour -- her de-facto re-entry into political life -- when various comments that had even a whiff of controversy or gaffe-status rocketed across the Internet at warp speed, with an assist from Republican opposition researchers.

Life as a candidate, of course, is something much different. Clinton knows this. But her Iowa pop-in was her first glimpse of the thorny new reality that awaits.

Vox: "Why Joe Biden trails Hillary Clinton by 44 points"

By Ezra Klein

September 18, 2014, 11:20 a.m. EDT

By most measures, Joe Biden has been a damn good vice president. When President Barack Obama wanted to make sure stimulus money didn't disappear to fraud, he turned to Biden — "nobody messes with Joe," he said — and Biden succeeded. When the White House wanted to avoid the fiscal cliff, it was Biden who closed the deal with Minority Leader Mitch McConnell. When Obama flubbed the first debate against Mitt Romney, it was Biden who restored the ticket's mojo by bullying his way past Rep. Paul Ryan. When the Democrats held their 2012 convention, it was Biden's speech that pulled the highest ratings — beating both Bill Clinton and Obama.

Biden's most off-the-reservation moment, meanwhile, is the kind of thing that should help him in 2016. He pushed the Obama administration to embrace gay marriage before it was quite ready. At the time, it looked like a gaffe. Now it looks prescient.

But what I wrote of Biden in January 2013 is still true today. "In the continuing drama that is the Obama presidency, Biden often appears as comic relief. He's the zany neighbor, the adorable uncle. As a result, his presidential ambitions, which burn brightly even today, have mostly been laughed off. Somehow, the sitting vice president of the United States, the former chairman of both the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and the Senate Judiciary Committee, a man who's on a nickname basis with many of the world's most powerful leaders, is seen in many quarters as lacking the gravitas to be president."

Or, to put it into numbers, according to Real Clear Politics' average of polls, Biden is running 44 points behind Hillary Clinton for the Democratic nomination in 2016 — and only one point ahead of Sen. Elizabeth Warren.

This week has been a reminder why. First, Biden angered Jewish groups by referring to shady lenders as "shylocks." Then he called Singapore's Lee Kuan Yew "the wisest man in the Orient." Biden has history of this kind of thing. In 2006, he said, "you cannot go to a 7-Eleven or a Dunkin' Donuts unless you have a slight Indian accent." In 2007, he called Obama "the first mainstream African-American who is articulate and bright and clean and a nice-looking guy." Biden, New York Magazine snarked, "is your accidentally racist grandma."

I have a theory on why these kinds of gaffes have hurt Biden so badly. (To be perfectly honest, I am not anywhere near sure it is correct.) I don't believe it's that people think Biden is so undisciplined that he can't be trusted with high-stakes diplomacy or late-night negotiations. Biden is doing that work now, he's been doing that work for a long time, and no one in the Obama administration or, from what I can tell, in the media, seems to think Biden incompetent or reckless.

Rather, these comments keep exposing a cultural gulf between Biden and the party he seeks to lead. Biden is an old-school, white, male politician in a party that's increasingly young, multicultural, and female. One of the biggest frustration for Team Biden is that their boss has become something of a joke on the internet — and that's partly because the people driving opinion online are young and very sensitive to the particular kind of gaffes Biden keeps making.

One of Obama's great strengths as a politician has been his recognition of the power of the younger, more multicultural, more digital wing of the modern Democratic Party — and his ability to forge a deep cultural connection with them. Biden's problem is that even if they like him, there's no authentic connection. The way he goes viral is by making them LOL.

This isn't just an age thing. Biden isn't much older than Clinton, but she's been more adept at signaling cultural affinity with young Democrats than he's been (though she's occasionally struggled too, most notably in her interview with Terry Gross on gay marriage). Even her memes are better.

I don't know exactly how Biden fixes this or even if he can. Clinton isn't inevitable, and Biden should, by all rights, pose a real threat to her. But, though Biden's always been known as a great speaker, he needs to learn to talk to a different party than the one he grew up in.

Washington Post blog: Erik Wemple: “Sharyl Attkisson just can’t stop sliming former employer CBS News”

By Erik Wemple

September 18, 2014, 12:43 p.m. EDT

Sharyl Attkisson’s resignation from the position of investigative correspondent at CBS News took place in March. The high-profile newswoman used the media interest in her departure to repeatedly tar her former colleagues as cowards — journalists afraid to upset those in power. Here’s one of the quotes from the media tour: “With various stories, you do get the idea at some point that they [CBS News] want you to stop, especially if you start to dig down right into something very, very important, and it’s not just with political stories – it’s with stories that go after other interests, corporations, different things.”

The tour, alas, isn’t over.

In an interview yesterday with NewsMaxTV’s “Steve Malzberg Show,” Attkisson chatted about her latest story for the Daily Signal, a site “supported by the resources and intellectual firepower of The Heritage Foundation.” Raymond Maxwell, a former State Department official, tells Attkisson of an attempt by aides to former secretary of state Hillary Rodham Clinton to cull or “separate” documents that shed the department’s leadership in a bad light before they were handed over to the investigators looking into Benghazi.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The story has gotten some pickup on Fox News and conservative outlets, along with some skepticism elsewhere. While chatting with Malzberg, Attkisson said that detractors had cited Maxwell's dabbling in poetry as a reason to question his credibility. Then she went off:

"I think the newish trend that I experienced when I was at CBS — it's fine to have other people say he's not credible because of his poetry. So you cover the story and you let Ray have his say and then you let his opponents say he's not credible — but what the media does now is they black out a story. They censor a story. They don't even want it covered. That's where I think it seems so sinister to me in America that the media chooses to basically blackball a story that they don't want out there. And I think they do it, quite frankly, lest the public come to the wrong opinion. They don't trust the public to come to what they think is the right opinion about something and I don't think we should be in the business of filtering facts and information because we don't like what the public may do with it."

Conspiracy, meet theory. Too bad Attkisson's very own experience contradicts it: While at CBS News, as we've detailed in a previous post, Attkisson wrote massively about Benghazi , Benghazi, Benghazi ,Benghazi , Benghazi , Benghazi , Benghazi , Benghazi , Benghazi , Benghazi ,Benghazi , Benghazi , Benghazi, Benghazi , Benghazi , Benghazi , Benghazi ,Benghazi , Benghazi , Benghazi , Benghazi , Benghazi . And that's not even the full list.

What a blackout!

Politico blog: Dylan Byers on Media: "AP's Peoples to cover Republican 2016 field"

By Dylan Byers

September 18, 2014, 10:17 a.m. EDT

The Associated Press has tapped Steve Peoples, its northeast political reporter, to cover the field of Republican presidential hopefuls in 2016, political editor David Scott announced in a memo to staff on Tuesday. He will move from Boston to Washington.

"For months during the last presidential campaign, Peoples was a fixture in the living rooms and coffee shops where the New Hampshire primary is won and lost," Scott wrote. "In recent months, even as he continued covering GOP contenders, Steve took it upon himself to keep the AP's political reporting team organized and on point, leading story discussion meetings and organizing coverage of key moments of the off-campaign year. His assistance has been invaluable to me as I get up to speed in Washington."

Peoples' counterpart on the Democratic side is Ken Thomas, who will be tasked with covering Hillary Rodham Clinton and the rest of the Democatic field. They'll be joined by Julie Pace and members of the White House team, as well as regional reporters from key states like Iowa, Florida and Colorado.

Two plausible paths for a narrow GOP win next year: The Electoral College math suggests two plausible paths for a narrow GOP win next year. John,

Nice to see you during the Convention. What a week. Thought your panel with T. Boone and Carl was a hit.

We are working like crazy to hold McCain accountable and are hoping you might know a donor or two who will consider an additional request this year.

Below are the updated 2008 fundraising needs and the latest from each state. I've also attached an updated one page overview.

Ted and I would be most appreciative of your help.

Thank you in advance.

COURAGECAMPAIGN

When Governor Arnold Schwarzenegger used the California budget crisis to slash the wages of nearly 200,000 state workers to the federal minimum wage of $6.55 per hour, the Courage Campaign led a petition campaign -- joined by True Majority and CREDO Mobile -- that delivered 28,016 petition signatures to Arnold's office. The Courage Campaign worked with SEIU 1000 (the local that represents state workers) and state representative David Jones to deliver the petitions and build earned media. Courage distributed two video shorts showing the irony of the governor's lifestyle as well as interviews with SEIU members facing the cuts. The Courage Campaign then held a statewide conference call with Controller Chiang, Rep. Hilda Solis, Working Assets CEO Michael Kieschnick and SEIU 1000 President Yvonne Walker and aired a member-funded TV ad featuring State Controller John Chiang, who heroically refused to to carry out the Governor's Executive Order. As a result of Controller Chiang's action, enthusiastically supported by Courage Campaign members, the Governor was forced to delay any wage cuts until November at the earliest, pending a budget compromise.

ProgressNow, along with DailyKos and the Alliance for a Sustainable Colorado, hosted the first-ever new media lounge at any national convention

-- the "Big Tent" during the Democratic Convention in Denver. Each day we hosted over 500 bloggers and new media journalists, with free wi-fi, free meals, free beer, and coverage of the convention from the opening gavel to close. The Big Tent became one of the most talked-about events of the convention in Denver, with hundreds of traditional media and elected officials dropping by to check out the new media lounge and meet with the bloggers. The Big Tent also featured breakout discussions on critical national issues sponsored by organizations like the Green for All, Sierra Club, US Action, Campaign for America's Future, Center for American Progress, Voto Latino, Color of Change, Planned Parenthood, and Moveon.org. We had coverage from the mainstream media worldwide, and earlier this week the Smithsonian along with the Newseum in DC have asked that we provide them materials about the Big Tent for their archives. Now that the 8000 square foot Big Tent has finally been disasembled, we are back to our primary focus of holding McCain and Schaffer accountable in the final strech.

In recent weeks, Progress Florida has placed two op-eds critical of Sen. McCain in two prominent Florida newspapers, organized a very successful press event in front of the Republican Party of Florida headquarters taking Sen. McCain to task for his anti-working families track record and launched MillionaireMcCain.com .

The first op-ed, titled "McCain deserts veterans on voting rights, benefits" ran in the Tallahassee Democrat and the second, "Nuclear Bull's-Eye Is On Our Back", was published in the Tampa Tribune.

The Progress Florida orchestrated press event Florida Republican Party headquarters in Tallahassee (the day before a high profile visit by McCain,) was a big success. Representatives from Florida AFL-CIO and Florida Alliance for Retired Americans made presentations on why Sen. McCain is out of touch with Florida's working families. Press in attendance included, 3 statewide TV news networks that provide news stories for more than 20 local news stations across the state, Clear Channel radio, Florida Public Radio, the Tampa Tribune and St. Petersburg Times.

Progress Michigan has lead the counterpoint to McCain visits to Michigan and helped American Votes partners message effectively about the McCain record. Immediately after the Republican National Convention, McCain came to Michigan and was welcomed by Progress Michigan and a throng of protesters under an "Outsource McCain, Not Michigan Jobs" banner. Press coverage was strong including stories in the AP and Detroit Free Press. A Companion website was launched at: www.progressmichigan.org/page/s/outsourcemccain . In response to the Palin and Giuliani attack on organizers, Progress Michigan launched: www.progressmichigan.org/mccainpalinapology/ Previously Progress Michigan led efforts countering McCain in Monroe, Rochester, and Farmington Hills with the anti-outsourcing message and received strong play on regional TV, radio and print media. We have also helped the AFL-CIO, Planned Parenthood, and Acorn prepare individual press events on the McCain record.

Alliance for a Better Minnesota teamed up with the Center for Independent Media and The UpTake citizen journalist team during the RNC in Saint Paul last week. In addition to providing bloggers with space, food and accomodations during their time in Minnesota, ABM hosted a series of expert panels on key issues surrounding conservative policies. Participants included: Common Cause, Sierra Club, Health Care for America Now, Minnesota 2020, The Blue Green Alliance, National Wildlife Federation, Alaska Wildlife League, League of Conservation Voters, The Bush Legacy Bus, Campaign for America's Future and New York Times Bestselling author Rick Perlstein.

Granite State Progress - Led effort to keep tax cap ballot initiative off November ballots
A conservative front group in New Hampshire aggressively pushed a tax cap ballot initiative targeted at six of the ten largest communities in New Hampshire - communities representing 20% of the statewide vote and 21% of the persuasion share. The deep-pocketed ideologues behind it intended to use the tax cap to turn out Republican-friendly voters during the November elections, and had already pre-purchased $140,000 worth of television air time for late October. Granite State Progress took a leading role on challenging the initiative, and provided political cover for others as the on-the-record opposition. After phone calls, media outreach and midnight chamber sessions, the tax cap will now only appear on the ballot in two towns this year, allowing resources and voter education to be directed to more important items.

Keystone PROGRESS

Pennsylvania: Keystone Progress has grown rapidly in its first few weeks. We now have over 27,000 on our rolls, with hundreds joining every week. We have generated dozens of news stories for ourselves and our partners, and hundreds of blog articles. KP has written and distributed news releases for the Sierra Club, Alliance for Retired Americans, ACORN, Planned Parenthood and SEIU, and has organized visibility event outside of McCain events in York, Lancaster and Washington, Pennsylvania.

fuse
Together for Progress

Washington State: Fuse is developing a progressive voters guide that covers the full ballot --- ballot measures and candidates down through the State Legislature. It compiles all the progressive political organizations' endorsements into a collective product, and is customized for recipients' districts. Almost every significant progressive c4 in the state will send this web and email-based sample ballot to their list, generating a distribution to 200,000-300,000 voters. Many c(3) organizations will distribute another version that includes only ballot measures.

Fuse is now launching a substantial field mobilization program generating volunteer phone-calling and doorbelling for targeted races, and is also undertaking a major earned media campaign targeting the Governor's race.

ONEWISCONSINNOW

One Wisconsin Now has organized progressive organizations to do issue-based counter events, press releases and online actions every time John McCain comes to town and generated coverage on television, radio, print and blogs across Wisconsin. OWN created and helps lead a "Stamporee," where an actor in a John McCain mask uses a five-foot-high rubber stamp to put "McSame" on the Bush agenda - to the delight of a Bush-masked actor. This week, OWN is launching www.McCainandUnable.com , that talks about the follies of John McCain and George W. Bush, as they experience in comic book style what real people face when the go to the gas station, buy food and numerous other episodes to be released on a weekly basis.

Bundler Collects From Unlikely Donors (Washington Post 8/6/08)
By Matthew Mosk; Page A01
The bundle of $2,300 and $4,600 checks that poured into Sen. John McCain's presidential campaign on March 12 came from an unlikely group of California donors: a mechanic ..., the manager of Rite Aid Pharmacy ... But the man who gathered checks from them is no stranger to McCain -- he shuttled the Republican on his private plane and held a fundraising event for the candidate at his house in Delray Beach, Fla. Harry Sargeant III, a former naval officer and the owner of an oil-trading company that recently inked defense contracts potentially worth more than $1 billion, is the archetype of a modern presidential money man.

Energy Returns as Major Issue (Washington Post 8/6/08)
By Perry Bacon Jr. and Michael D. Shear; A04
Barack Obama and John McCain used an ongoing debate over energy policy to tack back to core themes of their campaigns Tuesday, with Obama blasting his rival for the presidency as a clone of the current administration and the Republican seeking to revive his reputation as someone willing to buck his party on major issues.

McCain to Tour Nuclear Power Plant (AP 8/6/08)
John McCain's visit to a nuclear power plant, the first in recent history by a presidential candidate, highlights the promise and peril of a technology that is a key component of his sweeping plan to help the country overcome its energy crisis. The Enrico Fermi Nuclear Plant outside Detroit, named for the first physicist to split the atom, is home to both an operating power plant and another reactor that had a partial meltdown in the 1960s. It was decommissioned in 1972, while its successor continues to operate.

McCain goes nuclear on gas prices (Politico 8/6/08)

Sen. John McCain toured DTE Energy's Fermi 2 nuclear power plant today, touting nuclear energy is a "vital ingredient" to the nation's energy problem. ...About 40 protesters held a rally in front of the plant to coincide with Sen. McCain's visit. The rally was organized by AFL-CIO and citizens' watchdog groups like Progress Michigan and included union tradesmen protesting Sen. McCain's policies on energy, outsourcing of jobs and siding with Big Oil companies. About 10 supporters of Sen. McCain also attended to support the Republican presidential candidate.

By Christopher Wilson
Republican John McCain appeared to back down on Tuesday in his dispute with his opponent Barack Obama over tire pressure. ...The surprise came during a telephone town hall meeting McCain held on Tuesday with voters in Pennsylvania. "Obama said a couple of days ago says we all should inflate our tires. I don't disagree with that. The American Automobile Association strongly recommends it," McCain said.

McCain One-Ups Obama With Ad Buy (Washington Post 8/6/08)
It appears that spending $5 million on advertising during the Olympics will get a presidential candidate only the silver medal. McCain Thinks We're Better Off Than We Were 8 Years Ago - But Worse Off Than We Were 4 Years Ago (Huh?) (ABC blog 8/5/08)
Sen. John McCain's new TV ad asserts that "Washington's broken. John McCain knows it. We're worse off than we were four years ago." But the Obama camp notes that this is a somewhat different note than the one Sen. McCain sang during the primaries. The CNN debate January 30 featured the following exchange: "Are Americans better off than they were eight years ago?" asked CNN's Anderson Cooper. "I think you could argue that Americans overall are better off, because we have had a pretty good prosperous time, with low unemployment and low inflation and a lot of good things have happened," McCain said. "A lot of jobs have been created."

McCain had role in original Wilmington DHL deal (Cleveland's "Plain Dealer" blog 8/5/08)
When Republican presidential candidate John McCain meets Thursday with citizens and officials in Wilmington, Ohio, he won't need a playbook to understand why they're worried about deep job losses at the local freight airport. Little known to those citizens, McCain and his campaign manager, Rick Davis, played roles in the fate of DHL Express and its Ohio air park as far back as 2003. Back then, however, their actions that helped DHL and its German owner, Deutsche Post World Net, acquire the Wilmington operations resulted in expansion, not retraction.

The Hook and Bullet Crowd (TIME blog 8/5/08)
Posted by Jay Newton-Small
Remember in 2004 when John Kerry got ridiculed for his awkward duck-hunting trip in Ohio just before the election? There's a good reason why Kerry went hunting: the hook and bullet crowd – as they often tongue-in-cheek call themselves – are a hugely important swing vote in a lot of crucial states. According to the U.S. Census more than 34 million Americans fish annually and 16 million hunt. The top five populations include three swing states: Pennsylvania, Michigan and Wisconsin. And nearly half of the voters in Colorado, New Mexico, Montana, Wyoming and Utah -- 8 million people -- are hunters or fishers, according to the non-partisan conversation group Trout Unlimited.

Crude Campaigning (Washington Post 8/6/08)
By Ruth Marcus; Page A17
...with the unthinking zeal of the newly converted, McCain has morphed into a believer in the magical power of drilling. "We have to drill here and drill now," he has taken to crying on the campaign trail, as if he could get more sweet crude gushing by, say, November. On Monday, McCain, whose 2008 Senate attendance record is rather spotty, demanded that Congress "come back into town" to pass an energy bill. "Let's get this energy crisis solved," he proclaimed, as if a few weeks might make a difference.

No Crisis Is Immune From Exploitation Under Bush (WSJ 8/6/08)
By HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON; Page A15
... In the past few years, the number of corporations flocking to places like the Cayman Islands to evade U.S. taxes has exploded. One of these companies, former Halliburton subsidiary KBR, has used offshore tax havens to avoid paying hundreds of millions of dollars in federal taxes. To no one's surprise, instead of cracking down on KBR, the Bush administration has rewarded the company in April of this year with a 10-year, $150 billion contract in Iraq.

Moqtada Packs It In (WSJ 8/6/08)
Good news out of Iraq is becoming almost a daily event: In just the past week, we learned that U.S. combat fatalities (five) dropped in July to a low for the war, that key leaders of al Qaeda in Iraq have fled to the Pakistani hinterland, that troop deployments will soon be cut to 12 months from 15, and that Washington and Baghdad are close to concluding a status-of-forces agreement. Now this: Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr plans to announce Friday that he will disarm his Mahdi Army, which was raining mortars on Baghdad's Green Zone as recently as April. Coupled with the near-total defeat of al Qaeda in Iraq, this means the U.S. no longer faces any significant organized military foe in the country.

Jon Soltz: Senator McCain, Troops and Security Are No Joke (Huffington Post 8/5/08)
by Jon Soltz
Why is John McCain treating our national security, literally, as a joke? This week, Senator John McCain made clear that you shouldn't try to combat the rising cost of gas by checking your car's tire pressure, so your car gets more per gallon (something everyone from Al Gore to President Bush, from Joe Lieberman to Barack Obama, from NASCAR to environmental groups say you should do). He's even mocking the idea by handing out "joke" tire pressure gauges, and has a new childish web video out making a joke out of it.

VP wanted: No future presidents, please (LA Times 8/6/08)

Vice presidents once were little more than Senate chairs and presidential spares. Then they became presumptive heirs, favored candidates for their party's presidential nomination. George W. Tapping Tired Wells (Washington Post 8/6/08)
Barack Obama's new energy platform includes a pair of dubious planks. ...There were good ideas in the energy plan Sen. Barack Obama unveiled Monday. The most important of these is a cap-and-trade system for greenhouse gases that would auction off 100 percent of emission credits. The Illinois Democrat also announced a strong commitment to alternative energy sources and a stepped-up conservation effort. But then there were his proposals for a "windfall profits tax" on oil companies and his call to release oil from the Strategic Petroleum Reserve.

Our collective view on the video yesterday sounds the same as it is today.

It won't stop questions from being shouted at her the first time the press can
She is going to have to take and answer the question from the press herself at some point whether she does the video today or not.

And while there may not be consensus on this – my view on releasing a video first is that the press will eviscerate her for hiding behind a video instead of answering their questions.

1. She believes she needs to do this video is because her integrity is being attacked and she is the only one who can say she didnt make a decision as secstate based on a donor.
2. Imp point: The foundation has had little luck getting their surrogates booked on any serious shows. So she feels like it has to be someone at her level or WJC level that engages directly in order for there to be any coverage of the defense.
3. She doesnt want to continue to have to have press yell these questions at her in Nevada and CA and if she doesnt do the video, that is the situation she will be in

The Clinton Foundation is a totally non-political charity whose work saves and improves lives at home and around the world. Because of charitable contributions to the Foundation and its programs, 8 million people have benefited from lifesaving HIV/AIDS medications, 6,000 American schools are providing kids with healthy food choices in an effort to fight childhood obesity; 28,000 African farmers have improved their crops; and 248 million tons of greenhouse gas emissions are being reduced in cities worldwide. The Clinton Global Initiative brings together people from business, labor, government, and the non-profit world to solve problems without politics or gridlock. Rush Limbaugh: "Nobel Gang Just Suicide Bombed Themselves"

Newsweek

By Eve Conant and Daniel Stone

It's hard to tell who is more shocked by this morning's announcement that Obama has won the Nobel Peace Prize. Obama? Bill Clinton? The right? The left? Reporters who were present at the Oslo announcement audibly gasped. Obama has barely started his first term and has been awarded the greatest achievement for world peace…after only 280 days in office.

But perhaps the Nobel Peace prize Committee has succeeded in pro-actively promoting peace—in joining the hands of America's liberal and conservative blogosphere.

Obamamania comes as little surprise to Rush Limbaugh, who emailed us this morning after we asked him to share his thoughts. "The Nobel gang just suicide bombed themselves. Gore, Carter, Obama, soon Bill Clinton. See a pattern here? They are all leftist sell-outs. George Bush liberates 50 million Muslims in Iraq, Reagan liberates hundreds of millions of Europeans and saves parts of Latin America. Any awards?" Limbaugh says "Obama gives speeches trashing his own country and for that gets a prize, which is now worth as much as whatever prizes they are putting in Cracker Jacks these days."

"This fully exposes the illusion that is Barack Obama. It is a greater embarrassment than losing the Olympics bid. And with this "award" the elites of the world are urging Obama, THE MAN OF PEACE, to not do the surge in Afghanistan, not take action against Iran and its nuclear program and to basically continue his intentions to emasculate the United States. They love a weakened, neutered U.S and this is their way of promoting that concept. I think God has a great sense of humor, too."

While liberal pundits won't necessarily be lining up behind all of Limbaugh's views, there is equal parts astonishment in the left blogosphere as there is in the right. Daily Beast blogger Peter Beinart calls it "Obama's Nobel Farce": "Perhaps next they'll start giving Oscars not to the people who have made the best movies of last year, but to the people who have the best chance of making the best movies next year." He says he likes Obama as much as the next liberal blogger, but by giving the award to Obama, the Nobel Committee is just proving that they've fallen in love with celebrity and that giving Obama the prize as an "atta boy" they are only feeding the gap that conservatives are working to widen—"between Obamamania as global hype and Obama's actual accomplishments." The basic line: Obama won the prize not for being himself as much as for not being George W. Politics Daily Melinda Hennenberger points out, "It's not exactly like giving an Academy Award to a Vince Vaughn movie, but "surprising" doesn't begin to cover it. No word yet on whether Glenn Beck's head has exploded." Ezra Klein added a tweet: "Obama also awarded Nobel prize in chemistry. 'He's just got great chemistry,' says Nobel Committee." Ana Marie Cox wrote: "Apparently Nobel prizes now being awarded to anyone who is not George Bush."

Over at Fox and Friends the eye-rolling was in full force, as was the echo chamber. "This could arguably be the third person to win the award for not being George Bush: Al Gore, Jimmy Carter and now Barack Obama," said Fox and Friends co-host Brian Kilmeade. Co-host Steve Doocy retorted, "If there were a breakthrough, you would go 'wow,' Obama brought the sides together and got Iran to disarm. But what has he done so far?" In a statement mailed to reporters, RNC chairman Michael Steele joined in, wondering what Obama really has accomplished, other than letting his "star power" outshine peace and human rights workers. "One thing is certain – President Obama won't be receiving any awards from Americans for job creation, fiscal responsibility, or backing up rhetoric with concrete action." In other words, writes Frank Gaffney, Jr. on Newsmax, "Nobel Committee really, really likes Barack Obama and what he stands for. After all, he epitomizes the transnationalist nostrums and wooly-headed prescriptions the commitee has endorsed for decades."

Over at MSNBC, Morning Joe host Joe Scarborough (who was once a GOP congressman) had a little mockery of his own, calling it "hilarious" then asking to play a Saturday Night Live clip . "I have got to stop right here. I guarantee that Marisa Tomei did more to win the Academy Award in My Cousin Vinny than Barack Obama has done to win the Nobel Prize." Not long after, one of his co-hosts said that a senior Obama Administration official, they didn't say who, had just fired off an email telling Joe to quit being an "a--hole."

The National Review's blogger Andy McCarthy picked up where some of the mockery left off. "After a number of years, the NFL renamed its Super Bowl trophy after its most fitting recipient — it's now called the Vince Lombardi Trophy. I'd like to see the Nobel Foundation follow suit. If today's headlines said, 'Barack Obama Wins Yasser Arafat Prize,' that would be perfect." Over at the National Review's website, the top story is a photo of particularly smug-looking Obama, lifting his head high in the look he usually takes when doing heavy thinking. Blogger John Miller quoted Alice in Wonderland, suggesting that if Obama deserved the international honor, then everyone deserved a Nobel prize. Writing for Slate, Mickey Kaus argued that Obama should give it back. "Say he's honored but he hasn't had the time yet to accomplish what he wants to accomplish. Result: He gets at least the same amount of glory--and helps solve his narcissism problem."

Obama isn't the first strange winner of the peace prize - read more here . Read why the prize might also be too little, too late for Obama's sinking prestige stateside and why the award spells the end of the Nobel as we know it. For a refresh on the early accomplishments that put Barack Obama on the Nobel committee's radar, check out our coverage of his life, his ideas , his big day , his disciples , and his fans around the world.

McCain To Child, "Our Newest Veteran,": "I Would Remind You It Doesn't Take A Lot Of Talent To Get Shot Down"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

JOHN MCCAIN: [to young child] We've got our newest veteran right here. Come right up here. ... Great American. [child whispers in McCain's ear] I couldn't make out what his name is, but he's a great American-- [someone from crowd shouts his name] Matthew! Thank you, Matthew. Thank you for being here, pal. Great to see you. I'll tell Matthew, I would remind you it doesn't take a lot of talent to get shot down.

McCain: "Oil Executives Say Within A Couple Years We Could Be Seeing Results" From Offshore Drilling
JOHN MCCAIN: [...] And I'd like to mention offshore drilling if I could. My friends, we have to drill offshore. We have to do it! Oil executives say within a couple years we could be seeing results from it. So why not do it? We need to do it.

And I was pleased to note that, in case you missed it, when the President announced that we were lifting the Federal moratorium on offshore drilling that the price of oil went down ten dollars a barrel. So it does, if America can show as we move into this energy independent era, that we have significant oil and gas reserves and we aren't dependent on foreign oil, it will have an effect on the price of a barrel of oil. So it can have a beneficial effect in the short term, as well as the long term.

JOHN MCCAIN: I had the courage and the judgment to say that I would rather lose a political campaign then lose a war. It seems to me that Senator Obama would rather lose a war in order to win a political campaign.

McCain Slips Up on "Czechoslovakia" a Third Time, Explains the Gaffe
QUESTIONER: Russia, question mark?

JOHN MCCAIN: First of all, Mitt has been a tremendous help to my campaign. He has been on television, he does a better job for me than he did for himself. [...] Our party is united and we have a lot of energizing work to do. But we are united.

I'm very concerned about Russia. Very concerned that just recently because the Czechs agreed with us on a missile defense system, that they cut the gas supplies, the oil supplies to the Republic of Czechoslovakia. Remember, excuse me, Czech Republic. I used to call it, [laughs]. The Czech Republic, as you know is been a very staunch and aligning friend. And as you know, the Czech Republic and Slovakia split years ago, from time to time, some of us mistake and say Czechoslovakia. Where the fact is it's the Czech Republic.

And so, they are staunch allies. And so the questions in response to their agreement on missile defense, the Czech's have had their oil supplies reduced. And that's not the way we expect Russia to behave. There are plenty of enormous pressures on Georgia. They have not agreed with us and helped us in trying to restrain the Iranian progress towards the acquisition of nuclear weapons.

So the Russian behavior is more and more autocratic. And the internal stifling of dissent is of great concern. And by the way, our friends the Czech's have been our friends for a long time. They were behind the Iron Curtain, as you know. And both the Czech Republic and Slovakia have been good friends of ours since they split. So we need to make sure that we can help them. In particularly, point out that the Russian behavior, basically blackmailing their neighbors is not something that's acceptable in the world today.

So I worry about Russia. I don't think there's going to be a return to Cold War, that's not what I'm talking about. But Russian behavior becomes less and less in the interest of us throughout the world, frankly, then we had hoped and anticipated when the Berlin Wall came down.

Pot Calling the Kettle Black: McCain Says Rewards From Big Tobacco Prevent Progress In The War Against Cancer
PAULA ZAHN: [...] Are you essentially saying that those members of Congress are being bought and sold by the tobacco lobbies and that's why this issue won't move forward?

MCCAIN: I believe that the reason why we failed in enacting the legislation that passed through the Commerce Committee that I was chairman of, with one dissenting vote, that the reason why we failed was because of the influence of the tobacco companies, yes. And any objective observer would tell you that.

ZAHN: So as president what would you do about that? How do you stop that?

MCCAIN: I would lead America. I would lead America, and I would tell the American people to clean up this mess. My friends, how many people just were shocked when they filled up their gas tank? You know what Congress is doing today to try to address our energy problems? They're in gridlock. Gridlock, doing nothing. We're doing nothing. It's time American's put our country first and our party second. [...] If you asked anyone who observed our efforts to enact this legislation at the time, they will tell you that it is was the influence of the tobacco company. Now there were many members of Congress, and I don't know which ones that had honestly held views about in opposition to the legislation that we reported out of the committee that I chaired. And I respect those honestly held views, but I also believe that the tobacco companies played a very big role in making sure that legislation did not pass the United States Senate.

ZAHN: So what is it that members of Congress are afraid of in going up against the tobacco lobbyists? I mean obviously we know the kind of money that is contributed to campaigns. Above and beyond that, what is their fear?

MCCAIN: I'm not sure that they're fear-- I think that they're rewarded.

ZAHN: Rewarded in what way?

MCCAIN: Campaign contributions, many other ways. There's many ways that that happens in Washington.

ZAHN: And how do you stop that?

MCCAIN: Well, the American people are sick and tired of being sick and tired. And they want Washington cleaned up. And I will lead that effort. I didn't win Miss Congeniality in the United States Senate again this year because I took on the special interests, I've taken on the special interests. I've joined with Russ Feingold with campaign finance reform, I have joined with Ted Kennedy on immigration reform. [...] So, I've taken on the special interests and I've fought against them. And as President of the United States I think I can be much more effective. I think that's what presidents can do.

McCain: We Need To "Concentrate" V.A. Care on Wounds "Directly the Result of Combat"
QUESTIONER: [...] Sir, I'm a disabled Iraq war veteran. Myself, along with other disabled veterans have been having difficulties receiving benefits from the VA. The issue is from the adjudication process that hasn't been changed since World War I. When you become president, and I do mean when you become president, will you facilitate change in the adjudication process that is 90 years old?

JOHN MCCAIN: We did make some improvements in legislation that was recently passed by the Congress. We need to do more. But I think you would agree, first of all I thank you for your service. [...] Thank you, we have veterans of all wars here and of course you continue to inspire all of us. Uh, look, I carry with me usually a little card and a quote from General George Washington in 1789. That's why I mention our greatest generation being here too. And basically what he said in 1789, and I'm not as eloquent, he said the willingness with which young Americans will serve their country in time of war will be directly related to how the veterans of previous wars were treated by their fellow countrymen. Those words are as true today as they were then.

"I think we have great people working for the VA, I think you would agree with that. We have wonderful, dedicated people. I was recently down at the Phoenix VA, and met with them, some of them. And they're doing a great job.

"But we also know there's not enough facility, and there's not enough care. So here's my idea. And it's not originated with me, but I've consulted with so many, Paul, and Griff, and so many others who are here. Look, we need to concentrate our efforts to handle those wounds and those disabilities that are directly the result of combat. We need to expand our ability to treat PTSD. PTSD is going to be tough in this war, you know that. And we need to treat the combat wounds. We need to have increased ability to do so and right now, unfortunately, there are people who are, now drive a long way and they stand in line, and they have a routine healthcare need. And they stand in line, and they stand in line, to get an appointment, to get an appointment.

"Now my friends, we need to give those veterans who have routine healthcare needs a plastic card and say take that to the doctor, the healthcare provider of your choice and get the care you need. And meanwhile, [interrupted by applause] concentrate on our ability to treat PTSD, those wounds. The good news is, as you know, we're getting the wounded more quickly to medical care than ever before and we're saving so many lives. (Town Hall; Rochester, NH 07/22/08)

McCain Says He Still Believes in McCain-Feingold
AUDIENCE MEMBER: Now that you're the Republican nominee for President of these United States, do you have any second thoughts on McCain-Feingold campaign finance reform?

JOHN MCCAIN: This meeting is adjourned. [crowd laughs] I do not. I believe that today, still, the influence of special interests in Washington [has] crowded out the interests of the average citizens of the United States of America who are not represented by big money interests in Washington. Before we passed our legislation, it was routine for a trial lawyer, a union leader or a corporation executive to be called by a powerful member of Congress and say, I need a 6-figure or sometimes 7-figure check from you, and by the way, your legislation is up before my committee next week. And that's where all this earmarking and pork-barrelling also that corrupted us.

Corruption. I don't use that word lightly, my friends. We have former members of Congress residing in federal prison. If that isn't corruption, I don't know what is. So, we tried very hard. And I'll continue to try very hard to reduce the influence of special interests.

Look at the energy bill. I voted against the energy bill. Senator Obama voted for it. Look at the farm bill. [...]

So I'll continue to work to try to clean up and reduce--maybe never eliminate, but reduce the influence of special interests in Washington, DC. And I'd like to tell you that I think that in Washington today that your interests are uppermost. And I don't think they are in a lot of the legislative business that we do. So we'll have to continue to work to try to make sure that we can eliminate some of these very terrible practices that have become commonplace. And I also will count on some of our citizens to exercise their voice at the ballot booth. (Town Hall Meeting; Wilkes-Barre, PA 07/23/08)

Audience Member Uses Four-Letter Word, Criticizes McCain's Staff Members
MCCAIN: There's a phone, er, microphone. Call me? [laughter]

QUESTIONER: [...] You are, without a doubt, a true American hero. Senator McCain, you are the man that we want as President of the United States. I'm going to do a little straight talk. You're a straight talker and so am I. Very much. I'm a diehard Yankee and I'm a straight-talker.

MCCAIN: I could never tell from your accent.

QUESTIONER: Mine's not really a question, it's a statement. It's a statement about a lot of your campaign staff members. And I'll tell you right now, I know, I'm going to be right at the top of their shit-list. But I could care less.

MCCAIN: shhh!

QUESTIONER: You have a lot of people here, I'm one of your volunteers that has been doing work for you since I met you in October. There are a lot of people here that are volunteering their time. You got two people sitting right here next to me, [names them], they have done more work for you volunteering than a lot of your paid staffers have.

MCCAIN: A lot of them are on work-release programs.

QUESTIONER: And a lot of your signs outside today, they were put up by us not by your staff people.

MCCAIN: I understand and I thank you.

QUESTIONER: You gotta make some changes.

MCCAIN: I'm going to put you in charge.

QUESTIONER: I think you should put [names] in charge. They've done some good work for you, you got thousands and thousands of people who love you, admire you, respect you greatly, and we want you as our next President of the United States.

Hello All,

Due to flight delays and cancellations, we were not able to get a tracker to today's event. However, we were able to track the event via online streaming video. Below are the notes from that viewing.

Santa Barbara, CA: McCain Environmental Briefing

- Governor Arnold Schwarzenegger welcomes crowd and introduces McCain, says he is confidant that a McCain presidency will yield 'a sensible, consistent and forward looking energy policy'

McCain's Prepared Remarks:
LINK: http://thepage.time.com/transcript-of-mccains-remarks-in-santa-barbara-california/

ARLINGTON, VA — U.S. Senator John McCain will deliver the following remarks as prepared for delivery at an environmental and energy briefing in Santa Barbara, CA, today at 9:00 a.m. PDT (12:00 p.m. EDT):

Thank you all very much. I appreciate the hospitality of the Santa Barbara Museum of Natural History, and the warm welcome to California. I'm here to listen about energy issues as well as to talk. So let me just start things off with a few ideas.

We're in the middle of a great debate in this presidential campaign about the energy security of the United States. For my part, in recent days I've been laying out a clear agenda to protect our economy from runaway energy costs, and to break America's dependence on foreign oil. This is going to require the best efforts and ideas of our country, and I am confident we are up to the task. At a time when a gallon of gas is running at more than four dollars, our government needs to shake off years of partisan paralysis that have prevented America from achieving energy security. Nothing is more urgent right now than regaining our energy security — we need to get it done and get it right.

The immediate problems of high gasoline prices and of our strategic dependence on foreign oil are upon us. And on recent days I've been setting forth a plan of action. When people are hurting, and struggling to afford gasoline, food, and other necessities, common sense requires that we draw upon America's own vast reserves of oil and natural gas. When nations across Europe and Asia are building nuclear power plants to meet their electricity needs, America, too, must make more use of this clean, efficient, and proven source of power. And we must turn all the brilliance and ingenuity of America loose in the search for alternative energy sources — from cleaner coal and wind power to biofuels and solar.

But even as we address our present economic and strategic troubles, we face a long-term danger we hardly even understood back when America first learned to associate the word "energy" with "crisis." We now know that fossil fuel emissions, by retaining heat within the atmosphere, threaten disastrous changes in climate. No challenge of energy is to be taken lightly, and least of all the need to avoid the consequences of global warming.

Among the compelling evidence of this danger, satellite images reveal shrinking glaciers, Antarctic ice shelves and polar ice sheets. Our scientists have also seen and measured reduced snowpack, with earlier runoffs in the Pacific Northwest and elsewhere. We have seen sustained drought in the Southwest, and across the world average temperatures that seem to reach new records every few years. In the frozen wilds of Alaska, the Arctic, Antarctic, and elsewhere, wildlife biologists have noted sudden changes in animal migration patterns, a loss of their habitat, a rise in sea levels. The facts of global warming demand our urgent attention, especially in Washington. Good stewardship, prudence, and simple commonsense demand that we act to meet the challenge, and act quickly.

To dramatically reduce carbon emissions, I have proposed a new system of cap-and-trade that over time will change the dynamic of our energy economy. We will cap emissions according to specific goals, measuring progress by reference to past carbon emissions. By the year 2012, we will seek a return to 2005 levels of emission, by 2020, a return to 1990 levels, and so on until we have achieved at least a reduction of sixty percent below 1990 levels by the year 2050. In this way, we will transition into a low carbon energy future while staying on a course of economic growth. The purpose of this plan is to give American businesses new incentives and rewards to seek, instead of just giving new taxes to pay and new orders to follow. My strategy gives people time to adapt, instead of causing a jolt to your electricity bill and widespread shutdowns of tradition coal-fired plants.

For the market to do more, government must do more by opening new paths of invention and ingenuity. So I have proposed a permanent research and development tax credit, to open the door to a new generation of environmental entrepreneurs. I am committed to investing two billion dollars every year for the next 15 years on clean coal technologies — to unlock the potential of America's oldest and most abundant resource. And we will issue a Clean Car Challenge to automakers, in the form of a tax credit to the American people: For every automaker who can sell a zero-emissions or very close to zero-emissions car, we will commit up to a 5,000 dollar tax credit to each and every customer who buys that car. In the quest for alternatives to oil, our government has thrown around enough money subsidizing special interests and excusing failure. From now on, we will encourage heroic efforts in engineering, and we will reward the grea test success.

This is why I further propose we inspire the ingenuity and resolve of the American people by offering a $300 million prize for the development of a battery package that has the size, capacity, cost and power to leapfrog the commercially available plug-in hybrids or electric cars. This is one dollar for every man, woman and child in the U.S. — a small price to pay for helping to break the back of our oil dependency — and should deliver a power source at 30 percent of the current costs.

Energy efficiency is no longer just a moral luxury or a personal virtue. A smarter use of energy is part of a critical national effort to regain control of our own energy future. And in this effort, practical ideas are worth a lot more than uplifting lectures. It's not always a matter of making due with less energy. It's a matter of using energy in smarter ways. Business owners who invest in green buildings can cut their energy costs by as much as a third. Homeowners can save hundreds or even thousands of dollars a year with better light bulbs, appliances, windows, and insulation. Many Californians have understood the benefits of green technology for a while now and your governor sure understands them. Now we need to bring that smart ethic of environmental care to Washington.

Our federal government is never shy about instructing the American people in good environmental practice. But energy efficiency, like charity, should begin at home. So I propose to put the purchasing power of the United States government on the side of green technology. Every year the federal government buys upwards of 60,000 cars and other vehicles, not including military or law-enforcement vehicles. From now on, we're going to make those civilian vehicles flex-fuel capable, plug-in hybrid, or cars fueled by clean natural gas. If our great goal is to move American transportation toward lower carbon emissions, then it should start with the federal fleet.

Across our country and abroad, there are 3.3 billion square feet of federal office space, all but roughly ten percent of it owned by the public. Add it all up and that makes the federal government the single largest consumer of electricity in the world. This presents another enormous opportunity that my administration will take. By retrofitting where possible, and by applying a higher efficiency standard to new buildings leased or purchased, we can save taxpayers billions of dollars in energy costs, and move the market in the direction of green technology.

We must also redesign our national electric grid in a smarter, more efficient way. In some cases, our national power transmission system has not been built to match supply and demand. And the result is an excess of power where it's not needed, and a shortage of power where it is needed. In the long term, this will require a serious investment to upgrade our national grid to meet the demands of the 21st century — which will include a capacity to charge the electric cars that will one day fill the roads and highways of America. And to save both money and electrical power for our people and businesses, we will also need to deploy SmartMeter technologies. These new meters give customers a more precise picture of their overall energy consumption, and over time will encourage a more cost-efficient use of power.

In these and other ways, we can meet the challenge of global warming with all the resources of human ingenuity at our disposal. Like other environmental challenges — only more so — climate change presents a test of foresight, of political courage, and of the unselfish concern that one generation owes to the next. We Americans like to say that there is no problem we can't solve, however complicated, and no obstacle we cannot overcome if we meet it together. I believe this about our country. I know this about our country. And now it is time for us to show those qualities once again. I thank you all for the kind attention, and now let me turn you over to my friends on the panel.

Roundtable Panelists:

- Sen. John McCain
- California Governor Arnold Schwarzenegger
- Former Director of the CIA, Jim Woolsey
- Land Trust for Santa Barbara County Executive Director, Michael Feeney
- Dean of the School of Engineering at UC Santa Barbara, Matthew Tirrell

Roundtable Highlights:

JIM WOOLSEY

- The proposals John McCain has made are major steps toward cleaning up what we're doing with driving.
- Cleaner- yes, these proposals move in that direction
- In terms of security -- McCain's proposals are an 'extraordinary plus.'
- Affordability - it would be a huge step in what Americans have to pay for transportation, making it cheaper

SEN. JOHN MCCAIN

- We'll talk about where we are in developing this technology
- Yesterday, we saw cars that are hybrids, good news is that they look great, the bad news is that they cost $100K, but the next round will cost $60K
- Just like cell phones, the cost will come down

MICHAEL FEENEY

- I'm not an energy expert, my profession is land trust issues
- I appreciate the Senator's general approach
- I'm a little less optimistic in technology and the government's ability to embrace the changes that are needed to really turn things around
- There's no solution as to the where to store the radioactive waste of nuclear energy -- that's a huge issue for me
- I'm nervous that we are backsliding on our environmental standards
- I appreciate the spirit that you are trying to promote -- but I believe we have to be very cautious about how we approach these things without rolling back our environmental standards
- People need to realize all of us have to change and it's going to be more expensive -- too rosy of a picture has been painted

SEN. JOHN MCCAIN

- Thank you.
- Spent nuclear fuel -- the technology is there, the Europeans are doing it; 80% of France's electricity comes from nuclear energy; it's going great! You should visit there
- I look forward to discussing that issue more
- U.S. Navy has used nuclear energy for many years and there's never been a problem

MICHAEL FEENEY

- I appreciate your points
- I don't know how they are doing it in Europe, but I know that we're not working with nuclear waste well in the U.S.

MATTHEW TIRRELL

- Cutting demand for energy is the fastest, cheapest way to go about this
- However, demand is growing
- We need to talk about energy productivity -- how much we are getting out of the energy we're using
- There's a concern for supply -- but my opinion is that we'll run out of space before we run out of oil
- I'm more optimistic than Michael when it comes to the improvements that we seek in technology, I think there is a lot there
- The idea of a RND tax credit is a good one -- and I argue that it should be readily available to new energy sources
- In the short-term, decreasing our demand is something we should do

SEN. JOHN MCCAIN:

- How does the avg. citizen make their home more energy efficient?

MATTHEW TIRRELL:

- The utility companies can have a lot to do with this and work with the consumers
- Adoption of solar energy is one way

JIM WOOLSEY

- Solar energy use in California is a good example -- it should serve as a model

SEN. JOHN MCCAIN

- You have these solar panels that are now paper thin -- unlike what we had years ago, these heavy big things

GOV. ARNOLD SCHWARZENEGGER

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- We started this million solar roof initiative to expand our use of solar energy
- We've worked and tried out a lot of things -- and it'd be great if it was done on a national level
- We in CA are shooting for 20% renewables by 2020 -- nationally we are 1-2% -- European countries are already at 20%
- McCain will change this when President

MATTHEW TIRRELL
- Getting over the transportation barriers is important -- and your tax credit initiative is in that direction
- Lighting is also a big thing

MICHAEL FEENEY
- I think this is all good
- The more we can do to create the right price signals to consumers is good
- Make it more economical for renters and home-owners to use green technology

SEN. JOHN MCCAIN
- If you go to certain parts of the state you see wind farms
- But what about tide?

JIM WOOSLEY
- Tide technology is a bit behind of where we are with solar and wind energy
- Expansion of the notion of geo-thermal is really promising -- people are starting to realize that even slightly different temperatures can work
- There's a lot coming -- perhaps in tidal, definitely in geo-thermal as well as solar and wind in technological developments

SEN. JOHN MCCAIN
- Americans may not be as appreciative as maybe we are of what our energy needs are over the next 20 years
- We have energy needs that are going to need to be met -- with solar, wind, nuclear, etc
- We are not in a static situation -- we're in a dynamic one
- Matthew, maybe you can give us assessment of our energy needs?

MATTHEW TIRRELL
- Over the next 20 years -- our energy needs are expected to double, worldwide
- It's a HUGE growth
- As voracious our need is now, it's expected to double -- especially worldwide as third world nations develop
- There's a near perfect correlation between energy consumption and quality of life
- We're not going to be able to tell the rest of the world you can't have our quality of life

SEN. JOHN MCCAIN
- We have to stop the gridlock in Washington
- As president I will do that and reach across the aisle to get things done
- One of the reasons why Gov. Schwarzenegger enjoys the approval ratings he does is because he reaches across the aisle
- I will put our country first and my party second.

Just departed the baby furniture factory. She did the tour, which will have lots of great images come out of it, and while press couldn't hear her on the tour itself, she referenced what she talked about in the round table a few times, including a comment about all the machines being from other countries at the top.

The round table itself was another natural, substantive conversation on a range of issues, from drug use among young people to the need for a return to vocational training to capital gains taxes and spurring small business growth. A note that she hit hedge fund managers again for not paying their fair share in taxes.

She did very well in the opening, did the four fights, talked about our need to make the middle class mean something again, and did it with little to no looking at her notes sounding very natural.

At the end she chatted with the participants and then walked over to shake hands with the guests there. After some brief conversations she doubled back to the center to take some questions. The first question was about Clinton Cash and she did quite well with it, used our line about Republicans being focused on her and her being focused on the issues.

WMUR asked her 2 questions, one about staged events which she handled well, said she was hear to talk to people and doing this how she wanted to do it. The other question was a redux of the Clinton Cash question.

Will send a transcript this afternoon. Headed to Claremont now.

Clinton Foundation: “Statement from President Clinton and Secretary Clinton on the Passing of Governor Mario Cuomo”

[Statement]

January 1, 2015

We are terribly saddened by the passing of our friend Mario Cuomo. Mario's life was the very embodiment of the American dream. When he placed my name in nomination at the 1992 Democratic Convention, he said government had "the solemn obligation to create opportunity for all our people." In his three terms as Governor of New York, he honored that obligation. It was Mario Cuomo's great gift and our good fortune that he was both a sterling orator and a passionate public servant. His life was a blessing. Our hearts and prayers go out to Matilda, Andrew, Margaret, Maria, Madeline, Christopher, his grandchildren, and all who were blessed by his life.

Former President Clinton and former New York Sen. Hillary Clinton said that they were “terribly saddened” by the Thursday death of former New York Gov. Mario Cuomo (D).

“Mario's life was the very embodiment of the American dream,” they said in a statement released by the Clinton Foundation.

“It was Mario Cuomo's great gift and our good fortune that he was both a sterling orator and a passionate public servant,” they said. “His life was a blessing.”

Two of the most powerful families in Democratic politics, the Clintons and Cuomos were connected by more than ideology. Bill Clinton considered nominating Mario Cuomo to the Supreme Court in 1993, and Cuomo’s son, New York Gov. Andrew Cuomo (D), served as Secretary of Housing and Urban Development in the Clinton administration.

The Clintons were only two of many notable politicians who praised Cuomo. President Obama called him “a determined champion of progressive values.”

Cuomo spent more than a decade as New York’s governor before he was defeated in 1994 by George Pataki (R).

Time: “The 9 Times Hillary Clinton Has Taken a Stand Since 2013”

By Haley Sweetland Edwards

December 30, 2014

Like other presidential candidates, Hillary Clinton had an opinion on just about everything in 2008. How to reform the U.S. health care system? Check. What to do about climate change? Check. Even minor issues like how to lower the price of gas required her to come up with a plan.

But when she became Secretary of State, Clinton followed tradition and kept her opinions to herself, especially on domestic policy. And since leaving Foggy Bottom in 2013, she’s mostly avoided specifics.

She says she’s in favor of protecting the environment, for example, but has yet to stake out her position on fracking or the Keystone XL pipeline. She says she’s against eliminating net neutrality, but has yet to say what, exactly, the government ought to do to protect it. And while she’s talked a big game about U.S. military engagement abroad, it’s unclear how her positions on, say, Ukraine or Iraq would differ from those of President Obama.

That ambiguity is understandable. She doesn’t hold public office. She’s not officially on the ballot. And committing to a position publicly limits her future options, politically. But given how many times she hasn’t taken a position on the issue of the day, it’s worth noting the handful of times she has.

Here’s a look at the nine most substantive policy positions Clinton has staked out since stepping down as Secretary of State.

1) The U.S. needs serious immigration reform. When President Obama announced his controversial executive order in November shielding up to five million undocumented immigrants, Clinton tweeted her approval within minutes, and then followed up with a statement calling for immediate, bipartisan and comprehensive immigration that would “focus finite resources on deporting felons rather than families.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

2) The U.S. should have armed the rebels in Syria. In an interview with the Atlantic's Jeffrey Goldberg in August, Clinton blamed the rise of the so-called Islamic State, or ISIS, on the U.S. not doing enough to support moderate rebels when the Syrian civil war first broke out. "The failure to help build up a credible fighting force of the people who were the originators of the protests against Assad — there were Islamists, there were secularists, there was everything in the middle — the failure to do that left a big vacuum, which the jihadists have now filled," she said. That said, Clinton's ideas on how to rout ISIS now appear to be more or less the same as Obama's.

3) Gay people should be allowed to marry. In March 2013, Clinton formally announced in her support for gay marriage, marking a major reversal of the position she'd held for decades. Her rivals criticized her for jumping on the bandwagon only after the issue of gay marriage had become widely acceptable, but she defended herself as a "thinking human" who is allowed to "evolve" on issues.

4) Americans shouldn't torture people. At a human rights awards dinner in December, Clinton made her first public comments about torture since the Senate released its controversial report on the issue earlier this month. She said unequivocally that she is against illegal renditions and brutal interrogation methods. "The U.S. should never condone or practice torture anywhere in the world," she said.

5) The federal government should raise the minimum wage. In a speech at a campaign event for Massachusetts gubernatorial candidate Martha Coakley in October, Clinton told the crowd not to "let anyone tell you that raising the minimum wage will kill jobs – they always say that." She then went on to defend raising the federal minimum wage. As a senator, Clinton repeatedly proposed legislation that would automatically increase the federal minimum wage anytime members of Congress saw their own pay increase.

6) Negotiating with Iran is a good idea, so long as the U.S. gets a good deal. Much to the chagrin of many in the pro-Israel crowd, Clinton has not only expressed support for the administration's negotiations with Tehran over its nuclear program, she has taken credit for initiating the secret talks back in 2012. In the past year, she has lightly tempered that unequivocal support by cautioning that the U.S. should be careful about what it concedes to, repeating that "no deal is better than a bad deal."

7) The U.S. shouldn't trust Putin. At a speaking event this year, Clinton called the Russian President an arrogant bully. As Secretary of State, she said she was in favor of the Obama administration's "reset" policy with Russia, but her opinion of the policy appears to have cooled. "I think that what may have happened, is that both the United States and Europe were really hoping for the best from Putin as a returned president," she told CNN's Fareed Zakaria in an interview in July. "And I think we've been quickly, unfortunately, disabused of those hopes." While those seem like fightin' words, policy analysts point out that it's less clear how Clinton's distrust of Putin would translate to a change in actual U.S. policy—much less potential military engagement—in Ukraine.

8) All American kids should get free, high-quality pre-K. Anyone remotely familiar with Clinton's resume won't find this to be much of a shocker, but early-childhood education is one of the issues she's been most outspoken about in the last two years. She's advocated for everything from universal pre-K and free nurse home-visits for at-risk mothers, to expanding existing programs, like Head Start and paid family leave.

9) #Blacklivesmatter. Clinton took a shellacking this fall for failing to comment one way or another on the protests in Ferguson, Missouri, and about the Eric Garner case in New York. At an awards ceremony in December, she broke her silence—kinda. "Yes, black lives matter," she said, but then failed to elaborate. She has yet to say whether she's in favor of broad sentencing reform, body cameras on police, or how she might limit what military

Associated Press: “Who would benefit if Clinton decides not to run?”

By Ken Thomas

January 2, 2015, 3:21 a.m. EST

WASHINGTON (AP) — It's hard to imagine Hillary Rodham Clinton not running for president again — and easy to image the result of such a decision: political chaos.

"It would be shocking," says Tad Devine, a Democratic strategist who is advising Sen. Bernie Sanders, a Vermont Democrat who is considering a presidential campaign himself.

Early polling shows Clinton in a dominant position. Outside groups have been promoting her candidacy for more than a year. The fundraising juggernaut, EMILY's List, is well into a foundation for the campaign to elect the nation's first female president. All that has left the potential field frozen in place and locked down financial donors, endorsements and connections around the country.

But what if Clinton decided against another campaign? Those considered long-shots would become instant contenders and others planning to skip the race would give it a new look.

Some whose political fortunes and plans for 2016 could change if Clinton decides to pass on the race:

JOE BIDEN

In any other year, the sitting vice president would have an inside track to the nomination. But Clinton's dominant standing within the party has marginalized Biden in early 2016 discussion. In a Clinton-free campaign, the veteran of runs for president in 1988 and 2008 would be an early front-runner.

ELIZABETH WARREN

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Massachusetts senator is a favorite of liberal activists, some of whom are trying to "draft" her into running for president — even though she has repeatedly said she is not. Warren's populist economic approach and calls to rein in Wall Street resonate with many Democrats disappointed by the midterm elections and the gap between the wealthy and the poor. If Clinton decides not to run, Warren is sure to face pressure to fill the void.

The outgoing Maryland governor has been a workhorse surrogate for fellow Democrats, trying to build a network of financial donors — only to be effectively frozen by Clinton. Even without Clinton in the field, the Republicans' defeat of his hand-picked successor in Maryland — and sagging poll ratings at the end of his term — would complicate his campaign.

The former Virginia senator would bring a bipartisan record to the campaign: He served as President Ronald Reagan's Navy secretary. He is an accomplished author and decorated veteran, still carrying shrapnel from his service in the Vietnam War. He is independent and at times unpredictable, and his foreign policy outlook and outsider status could shake up the primary with or without Clinton.

Few Democrats expect the independent senator from Vermont to make much of an impact if he runs against Clinton, but that has not stopped Sanders from courting college students and liberals in Iowa and New Hampshire. He has maintained a large email distribution list, giving him a way of reaching activists, but is still more likely to shape the debate than compete for delegates no matter what Clinton does.

When New York Gov. Mario Cuomo declined to seek the White House in 1991 after a lengthy deliberation, the vacuum helped a relatively unknown Arkansas governor named Bill Clinton. If Hillary Rodham Clinton decides not to run, it could give his son, New York Gov. Andrew Cuomo, an opening to jump into a race he does not plan to contest. The second-term governor has built a record of accomplishments on marriage equality, gun control and, last month, banned hydraulic fracturing in New York — a move cheered by environmentalists.

TIM KAINE

The Virginia senator has big-time credentials: He's a Spanish-speaking former Catholic missionary, Harvard Law graduate, former mayor of Richmond, Virginia, and the ex-governor of the state. Kaine quickly embraced candidate Barack Obama and found himself on the short-list for vice president. Instead, Obama put him in charge of the Democratic National Committee and Kaine later succeeded Webb in the Senate. He has backed the pro-Clinton Ready for Hillary super PAC, and would get a serious look if Clinton took a pass.

KIRSTEN GILLIBRAND

The energetic New Yorker holds Clinton's old Senate seat and has been talked up as a potential heir apparent. A relative newcomer to the national stage, Gillibrand has displayed a strong acumen as a legislator, fundraising moxie, and a down-to-earth sensibility as the constantly juggling mother of two boys. She has championed legislation to remove sexual assault cases from the military chain of command and promoted paid family leave for women.

The first woman elected to the Senate from Minnesota, Klobuchar has made political trips to neighboring Iowa to help Democratic candidates and the party, moves that always start talk about the White House. A former prosecutor, Klobuchar has built a reputation in the Senate for working across the aisle. On the dinner circuit, she displays a folksy sense of humor that helps her connect with Democratic audiences.

HOWARD DEAN

The former Vermont governor and contender for the party's 2004 presidential nomination has backed Clinton, giving the former secretary of state an advocate among the party's liberal wing. As DNC chairman, Dean helped modernize the party's technological capabilities, laying the ground work for Obama's successful grassroots campaign in 2008. He's unlikely to leave the private sector, but may be swayed if Clinton decided to take a pass on another campaign.

Business Insider: “Hillary Challenger Jim Webb's Defense Of His PAC Doesn't Add Up”

By Hunter Walker

December 31, 2014, 7:57 p.m. EST

A spokeswoman for a political action committee headed by potential 2016 presidential candidate Jim Webb released a statement on Tuesday responding to a Business Insider story that raised questions about nearly $100,000 in payments the committee made to Webb's family.

"This story as written misrepresents reasonable compensation for real and provable work done. Adding up numbers across several years for a sensational headline doesn’t tell the story. We’re happy to be fully transparent on this for journalists interested in the whole story," Ashleigh Owens said.

However, this statement did not identify a single factually inaccurate element of the story. It also did not address several of the major questions raised about the committee, which was supposedly established to support "candidates and entities" who advocate economic fairness, "reorienting our national security posture," and developing greater accountability in government.

Despite Owen's claim Webb's team is willing to be "fully transparent" about this issue, they repeatedly declined to communicate with Business Insider about these issues.

Business Insider first reached out to Owens about this story before it was published on Tuesday. She asked us to provide a list of specific questions. Owens never answered those questions or any subsequent emails. Neither Webb, a former Virginia senator, or his staff responded to requests to discuss their statement on Wednesday.

Owens' statement went on to defend the payments the committee made to Webb's daughter, Amy, and his wife, Hong Le Webb. Campaign finance reports filed with the Federal Election Commission show they were paid about $91,000 from 2009 through Nov. 24, 2014.

"Amy Webb has been involved in the administration, management and design of Jim Webb’s websites for many years, including the management of JamesWebb.com since 2001," Owens said. "She has provided the same services to the Born Fighting PAC since 2009, including the handling of FEC compliance matters since 2013."

The statement did not address the fact the story pointed out the committee paid Amy Webb was paid $1,000 for "website services" in 2013 even though archived versions of the Born Fighting PAC site showed it was not updated at all during this period apart from a two-sentence note thanking donors for their "past support."

Owens' statement also did not address the fact the committee continued to take donations from 2011 through 2014 even though it made no contributions to any other entity whatsoever during this period.

The statement claimed Hong Le Webb was paid "for her activities relating to various aspects of multiple website designs from the period February through September 2014, including vetting design consultants, negotiating contracts and content management." The records show she received $13,800 for overseeing the redesign of the committee's relatively simple site. At the same time, the firm that executed the design seems to have been paid less. It received $10,000.

Owens' statement also did not address a separate issue raised by the Business Insider story.

In addition to the money paid to Webb's family, the records show the committee only used about 20% of the money it spent to support its stated mission of contributing to political candidates and groups. The PAC spent over four times as much as it took in after receiving nearly $1 million in donations.

The fact so little of the donor money taken in by Webb's PAC went to its stated purpose was entirely ignored in Owens' statement.

CNN: “Hillary Clinton's point of no return”

By Dan Merica

January 1, 2015, 4:46 p.m. EST

Washington (CNN) -- As Democrats close to Hillary Clinton recover from their New Year's Eve celebrations and flip their calendar to 2015, many will notice a seemingly unimportant date is fast approaching.

For months, pro-Clinton Democrats have pointed to early January -- particularly Jan. 15 -- as a symbolic date for Clinton's presidential aspirations. In conversations with one another and at strategy sessions about a possible 2016 run, former aides and confidants have quietly said that if Clinton doesn't say "no" to running by the start of 2015, she is a go for 2016.

"If she hasn't said 'no' by January, it will be a sign she is running," said one longtime Clinton friend at last month's Ready for Hillary strategy session in New York.

The early January time frame is regularly used by Clinton supporters as a way to put off directly answering the will she/won't she questions posed by reporters. While the date itself is not totally significant, it has become a shorthand for early January. With that time frame now approaching, some in Clinton's orbit are admitting that time is running out for Clinton to say "no."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"If she is not going to do it, she can't let it drag on after January 15," said a Democratic strategist close to Clinton. "If she hasn't said something after that date, people should assume she is running."

The strategist, who said this was the general sense among people close to Clinton, added, "She has two weeks to say she isn't running."

The reason is simple: Clinton has, so far, sucked up all the oxygen in the Democrats' 2016 conversation. If she lets that continue well into 2015 and then decides to back out, she puts her party -- which already has a thin bench of second tier candidates -- in a tough position.

While chatter about former Sen. Jim Webb, Sen. Elizabeth Warren and Vice President Joe Biden have bubbled up throughout late 2014, neither have caught fire in the polls. The latest CNN/ORC poll finds Webb at a paltry 1%, Warren in second place with 9% support and Biden in third at 8%. Hillary Clinton, by comparison, is at 66% support.

Because of the uncertainty around her announcement date, groups urging Clinton to run intend to continue their work well into 2015. Ready for Hillary, the grassroots super PAC organizing on Clinton's behalf, has events planned well into March but plans to close shop once Clinton announces. Groups like Correct the Record, a communications and research shop, and Priorities USA, a fundraising and ad buying outfit, have both pledged to ramp up in early 2015.

Although Clinton's candidacy has long been a forgone conclusion to many of her close confidants, there are still some who hold out that she might decide not to run and has yet to make up her mind.

Clinton has tried to play coy with her presidential ambitions, but began to more forcefully acknowledge her thoughts near the end of 2014. She has met with potential campaign staffers, according to her spokesman, and people close to her have begun to carefully line up a potential political operation.

Clinton herself even used January 1, 2015 as a time frame for her decision.

"I am going to be making a decision around -- probably after -- the first of the year," Clinton said during a September appearance in Mexico City.

Yahoo News column: Matt Bai: “Is Jim Webb for real?”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By Matt Bai

January 1, 2015

[Subtitle:] Liberals like him now, but wait until they hear what's on his mind.

"I'm not running against Hillary Clinton," Jim Webb told me this week, when I tried to draw him out on the presumed Democratic front-runner. "I'm not even running at the moment, and she isn't, either."

That's all technically true, but Webb's recent announcement that he was taking the first official step toward a 2016 presidential bid nonetheless set off a round of commentary about the contrast between him and his former Senate colleague. On the FiveThirtyEight blog, Harry Enten concluded that Webb could be "the ideal Clinton challenger." Al Hunt of Bloomberg News said Webb could be Clinton's "worst nightmare," while William Greider wrote in The Nation that Webb might become "a pivotal messenger" for the left.

Such predictions are easily made and seldom remembered. They don't tell you much about whether Webb, who has as varied an experience in public service and foreign policy as anybody else out there, can really mount the kind of semi-serious challenge to Clinton that Bill Bradley did to Al Gore in 2000, or whether he'll end up being something more like this year's Wesley Clark.

Webb has some things going for him, starting with unusual courage for a politician. He went through Vietnam, and he loves his second career as a writer of books and screenplays, and those two things have always seemed to make him more impervious to the consequences of conviction than most other politicians, who cling to their seats with a kind of irrational tenacity.

To Webb, there are worse things in life than losing an election or even being drummed out of your party, and that counts for a lot when you have a looming presence like Clinton who's going to scare away most of her more obvious challengers.

And despite what he may say about not comparing himself to Clinton, Webb has the beginnings of a two-pronged progressive critique. On economic policy, Webb will say the party — personified by the Clintons — has been too much in the grasp of big financial institutions and too little beholden to wage earners. He's a little like Elizabeth Warren this way, only with more backwoods steel than Cambridge preachiness.

He's also a sharp critic of the foreign policies pursued by both George W. Bush and Barack Obama, which he says have led us into wars — and kept us in them — without clear objectives or strategies. This puts him squarely at odds with Clinton, the former secretary of state, who was known to be one of the administration's more ardent interventionists.

All that will sound pretty enticing to liberals looking for some viable alternative, and it should. But then you come around to Webb's long-held and thoughtful views on the party's core theme of social justice. And here's where that whole savior-of-the-left thing gets a little complicated.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Democrats, as you probably know, have been losing white voters, and especially white male voters, by pretty staggering margins in recent elections, particularly in rural parts of the country. According to exit polling, the party's candidates won only 34 percent of white men last November; the 30-point spread between the two parties was the largest in 20 years.

Go to any activist meeting or liberal dinner party, and chances are you will hear a pretty consistent narrative to explain this trend. Basically, it goes like this: White men, and especially Southern white men, are just inherently racist and afraid of social change, and so they're easily manipulated by Republicans and have turned their backs on Obama. But that's really OK, because the demographics of the country are rapidly shifting, and very soon there will be enough black and Latino voters — not to mention women of all races — to tip the balance of any national election into the Democratic column.

Webb finds this theory downright offensive. In his view, Democrats have focused so much of their rhetoric and their programs on racial minorities that they've basically forgotten about all those white, working-class voters who face some of the same economic hardships but feel like all the focus is on the poor.

"I think this is where Democrats screw up, you know?" Webb told me. "I think that they have kind of unwittingly used this group, white working males, as a whipping post for a lot of their policies. And then when they react, they say they're being racist."

Back in 2010, under a Wall Street Journal headline that referred to the "myth of white privilege," Webb called for an end to federal affirmative action programs, saying they no longer helped African-Americans and only served to embitter white voters. More recently, including in our conversation, he has obliquely assailed "interest groups" that divide the parties by race.

Twice I asked Webb which interest groups he had in mind, but he demurred. "I think it's pretty clear, if you look at the policies of the Democratic Party, how they shape their strategic agenda," Webb said. I was left to conclude that he was talking about the influence of civil rights or pro-immigration groups (which seemed odd, really, since in reality those groups have about a tenth of the power that teachers, trial lawyers and organized seniors exercise over Democratic politics).

Before anyone on the left attacks Webb as a former Reaganite and closet conservative, it's worth remembering that he isn't saying anything all that different from what Bill Clinton told the liberal base on cultural issues in 1992. In fact, as a candidate, Barack Obama made a similar case for winning back white voters.

The thing is, both of those men had the luxury of running after their party had lost consecutive presidential elections, and when activists were willing to hear some hard truths if they added up to a winning strategy. This primary season will be a lot more like 2000, when the party's liberal base was nearly erupting with pent-up fury from having to endure eight years of governing and all the ideological compromise that comes with it.

The last thing liberals want to hear right now (and especially after the recent uproar over police brutality) is that they're too focused on racial equality and aren't being solicitous enough to rural white men.

For this reason, mostly, I have a hard time seeing Webb as the pivotal messenger for a party still organized around 1960s notions of social justice. But that doesn't mean he won't have an impact, and it doesn't mean, if you're Hillary Clinton, that you shouldn't be paying close attention.

Clinton's allies in Washington have been trying for months to sell her — and the rest of us — on the idea that she won't be seriously challenged for the nomination if she runs. This has never seemed very plausible to me, and it's going to seem even less plausible once Webb starts running around the country picking apart her Wall Street connections and military adventurism.

At that point, other, more cautious potential rivals — like, say, Warren or a governor like Martin O'Malley — are probably going to see that there is, in fact, a market for a progressive alternative (there always is), and they're going to think they can fill it better, because that's what makes them politicians.

Where the courageous plunge in, others generally follow.

Washington Post: "With eye on 2016, Jeb Bush resigns from all boards"

By Tom Hamburger and Lyndsey Layton

December 31, 2014

Former Florida governor Jeb Bush, moving closer to a possible presidential run, has resigned all of his corporate and nonprofit board memberships, including with his own education foundation, his office said late Wednesday night.

He also resigned as a paid adviser to a for-profit education company that sells online courses to public university students in exchange for a share of their tuition payments.

Bush's New Year's Eve disclosure, coming in an e-mail from an aide to The Washington Post, culminated a string of moves he has made in recent days to shed business interests that have enriched him since leaving office in 2007. The aide said the resignations had been made "effective today."

The aide said Bush was reviewing other businesses in which he is principal partner or owner, such as Jeb Bush & Associates, a consulting firm, and Britton Hill Partnership, a business advisory group that in 2013 set up private-equity funds investing in energy and aviation.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Aides said Bush wants to devote his time to exploring a return to politics rather than pursuing his business commitments. But separating himself from those interests now could also be a strategic attempt to prepare for the added scrutiny of a hotly contested campaign for the Republican nomination.

Bush's financial stake in Academic Partnerships, the online education firm, has been relatively small for a millionaire — a $60,000-a-year fee and ownership of a small amount of stock, said Randy Best, the company's founder and chief executive. Even so, Bush's affiliation with the firm — which has contracts with schools in a half-dozen states and several foreign countries and has annual sales of $100 million — could complicate his effort to promote his record as an education reformer.

The company receives up to 70 percent of the tuition some students pay to public universities, and some faculty members say it siphons money from the schools while asserting too much control over academic decisions.

Best, a Texas entrepreneur and major political donor, said his firm has increased professors' access to online students and helped schools attract additional revenue, while Bush aides say the former governor does not have business interests related to K-12 education, which has been his policy focus.

Bush's decision to extricate himself from his private-sector work is "part and parcel of a process he is going through as he transitions to focus on a potential run for president," said his spokeswoman, Kristy Campbell. "This is a natural next step that will allow him to focus his time on gauging interest for a potential run."

The effort underscores the lengths to which Bush — who has become the favorite prospective candidate of many major GOP donors and has been at or near the top of polls testing the possible Republican presidential field — appears willing to go to avoid pitfalls that hurt the party in 2012. That year, GOP nominee Mitt Romney, founder of a private-equity fund, struggled to explain his business background while under attack by GOP rivals and President Obama.

Bush, 61, lamented Romney's handling of the criticism in an interview last month with Miami's WPLG-TV. Bush said the 2012 nominee allowed himself to be pulled "off message" and should have told voters: "I'm a problem-solver. My life has been about building things up."

Of his own business record, Bush said: "I'm not ashamed. Taking risk and creating jobs is something we ought to have more of."

Bush's business portfolio is far smaller than that of Romney, whose Bain Capital became one of the country's most successful private-equity firms. Yet it is complicated and could present political problems because he has been affiliated with a broad range of industries and businesses.

Bush announced last month that he was ending his consulting relationship with Barclays, the British investment-banking conglomerate. The New York Times reported in May that the company paid Bush more than $1 million a year.

The bank, like other major Wall Street players, had been under scrutiny in recent years for alleged interest rate manipulations and for allegedly providing special benefits to big traders.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Recent Securities and Exchange Commission filings revealed that Bush was leaving the boards of two publicly traded firms: Rayonier, which invests in forest lands, and Tenet Healthcare, which backed Obama's health-insurance initiative and profited from its passage.

From Tenet, Bush has received nearly $2.1 million in director's fees and restricted company stock since joining the board in 2007. The filings show that he sold some of his Tenet stock through the years. A March 14, SEC report showed that Bush held 59,403 shares of Tenet stock valued at the time at just over $3million.

Academic Partnerships stood out in Bush's business portfolio because it allowed him to combine a public policy issue he cared about with a business investment.

Bush's reputation as an school reformer stems from his work on K-12 education as governor and as the head of his Foundation for Excellence in Education. He has been an advocate for online learning as a tool to expand opportunities for students.

While Bush's association with the company began several years after he left office, Best contacted him about a possible business partnership before his departure from Tallahassee. The Texas businessman had connections to the Bush family, having raised money for the successful presidential campaigns of Bush's older brother, George W. Bush.

After the two men met, Best sent Bush an e-mail in April 2005 touting a "huge global business opportunity" that could come from a "post-secondary initiative" he said they had previously discussed. He said he hoped Bush found the idea "intriguing."

"If you are interested, let's continue our discussions as you begin to think about returning to the private sector after you leave office," Best wrote in the e-mail, which was obtained by The Post as part of a public-records request.

Bush responded that he had "pledged to myself to focus on my job until it is complete. I think I have a duty to do so."

"Having said that," Bush continued, "I think your vision is outstanding."

Best said in an interview that he approached Bush at the time because he had heard that the governor might be looking for opportunities in the private sector. "I tried to get him in the water early," Best said.

Years later, Best said, Bush was drawn to the firm because he has long been "intrigued by innovation in education," particularly the goal of "bringing down the cost of higher education while maintaining quality."

In his capacity as an adviser, Bush was "available to run ideas by and discuss concepts" as the firm expanded,

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Best said.

He said Bush helped preside over two conferences on the future of education hosted by the firm. Bush and former North Carolina governor Jim Hunt (D) helped draw a high-powered lineup of speakers, including Hillary Rodham Clinton, the likely Democratic presidential front-runner, who addressed a March meeting on global education.

A 2012 report by the Texas Tribune said the company received $105 million in revenue from 24 public colleges and universities, including eight in Texas. Forbes magazine reported in 2013 that the company had contracts with 40 U.S. schools.

Bush and Best wrote a 2013 article for Inside Higher Ed predicting that online classes would make higher education more accessible. “Companies like ours — Academic Partnerships — are helping universities respond to this transformative movement,” they wrote.

On some campuses, however, faculty members have viewed the arrival of Academic Partnerships with suspicion.

When the company arrived at Arkansas State University in 2011, for instance, faculty members were concerned “about a loss of quality and control,” said Jack Zibluk, a professor of media studies who headed the faculty senate at the time. Additional controversy erupted, he said, when some school officials involved in negotiations with the company later landed jobs with an affiliated firm.

Experts said that whether to do business with a contractor such as Academic Parternships remains a subject of great debate for university administrators.

“I don’t question whether firms like Academic Partnerships do quality work,” said Barbara Bichelmeyer, who directs online education for the seven campuses of Indiana University, which has chosen not to outsource its online learning programs. “The question we are engaging is about the ownership of the online educational experience — and whether a public institution is comfortable outsourcing this work in whole or in part.”

Best said that academicians’ concerns about his company — and online education generally — have largely diminished.

“It just increased their access to online students,” he said. The additional tuition received by schools “is revenue they would never have otherwise.”

Best said Bush called his cellphone Dec. 16, after announcing plans to explore a presidential bid, to let him know that he planned to resign from the company. Best said he plans to support Bush’s candidacy.

“He is the closest thing we have to a bipartisan candidate” who takes principled stands on tough issues such as immigration and education, Best said. “He is not going to be a person who responds to the polls or every change in the political winds.”

The Hill blog: Ballot Box: “Rubio closer to decision on 2016 bid”

By Molly K. Hooper

January 1, 2015, 3:49 p.m. EST

Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) says he’s closer to a decision on whether to run for president than he was last month.

In a wide-ranging interview with National Public Radio (NPR), Florida’s junior senator revealed Thursday that he hasn’t “made a decision yet,” but it will come “certainly soon.”

“The decision I have to make is: Where is the best place for me to serve America to carry out this agenda that I have to restore the American Dream given the dramatic economic changes we’ve had in the 21st century? … Is it in the Republican majority in the Senate or is it as a candidate, and ultimately as president of the United States?” Rubio asked in the interview.

Rubio - a protege of likely GOP presidential contender and former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush - contends that his decision will be made on “the basis of facts and reality,” not whether another prominent politician from the Sunshine State will run.

“I have tremendous respect for Gov. [Jeb] Bush, and I’ve said repeatedly if he runs he’ll be a very credible candidate. … As far as, you know, speculating about whether two people from the same state can run, it’s not unprecedented,” Rubio said.

The possibility of two prominent Florida politicians vying for the GOP presidential nomination could place a number of potential backers in a tough position.

Earlier this year, Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (R-Fla.) predicted that if Bush ran, Rubio would not.

But Rubio told NPR that if he decides a presidential run would better position him for helping others accomplish the American Dream, “then that’s what I’m going to do irrespective of who else might be running.”

As for the immediate future, Rubio predicts that President Obama will make good on a promise to use his veto pen to kill bills passed by the Republican-controlled Congress. But there will be some instances in which Obama may not succeed, Rubio added.

“I think we’ll have a supermajority, a veto-proof majority to impose additional sanctions on Iran and to require the administration to come before Congress for approval of any deal that he has with Iran,” Rubio said. “I think the same is true for the Keystone pipeline, potentially.”

Hillary bets her prose can triumph over Bernie's poetry

BY JAMES HOHMANN

Hillary speaks during a Democratic town hall in Des Moines last night. (Patrick T. Fallon/Bloomberg)

THE BIG IDEA:

Hillary Clinton said last night that she "loves" the new Bernie Sanders ad set to Simon and Garfunkel singing, "They've all come to look for America." Then she tried to offer a reality check.

"Now, look," she said during a town hall in Des Moines. "You campaign in poetry. You govern in prose. And we need a lot more poetry in this campaign. But I believe that I'm the better person to be the Democratic nominee, and the commander in chief."

The campaign-in-poetry, govern-in-prose trope was coined by the late Mario Cuomo, the liberal New York governor. Was it a coincidence that Cuomo's son, Chris, was moderating the event for CNN?

For Clinton, it gave fresh life to a mantra that she unsuccessfully tried to use as a cudgel against then-Sen. Obama in 2008. "You campaign with poetry, but you govern with prose," she often said , downplaying his rhetorical abilities.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In an interview published earlier yesterday, President Obama dismissed comparisons of Sanders to himself or this campaign to 2008. "I don't think that's true," Obama told Politico . He said the fact that Clinton knows "every policy inside and out … could make her more cautious, and her campaign more prose than poetry."

Just like last time, Clinton, locked in a neck-and-neck race in Iowa, is trying to grab the mantle of change late in the game. Last night, she had a moment that might help. A first-time caucus-goer who said he's leaning toward Sanders told Clinton that many of his friends find her to be "dishonest" and inauthentic. "I've been on the front lines of change and progress since I was your age," she replied . "I've taken on the status quo time and time again." The crowd loved it.

The two newsiest quotes from the night—

Sanders on his ambitious plans : "Yes, we will raise taxes. Yes we will."

Clinton on her email server : "I'm not willing to say it was an error in judgment because nothing I did was wrong."

-- Federal offices in D.C. will remain closed today as the city recovers from the snowstorm. So is every major school system in the region. (List here.)

- Metro mostly resumed rail service at 5 a.m. But it could not open the Silver Line, and at the last minute the transit agency said workers are unable to restore train service at four Orange Line stations that were expected to reopen: Vienna, Dunn Loring, West Falls Church and East Falls Church. Bus service will be expanded over the course of today, although it is still extremely limited. (The latest on the clean-up effort is here .)
- Tragedy 1: A snow plow hit a pedestrian walking down the street in Montgomery County about 8 p.m. The man's injuries are described as significant but not life threatening. (Martin Weil)
- Tragedy 2: A family in New Jersey was trying to dig its way out when the chill became too much to handle. The mother and her children — ages 1 and 3 — huddled in the car with the engine running to keep warm. The kids' father tried to clear the snow outside. But the tailpipe was clogged with snow, pushing deadly carbon monoxide gas into the car. When the father went to check on them, he could not wake them up. (Lindsey Bever) forecasts. “Partly to mostly cloudy skies with warmer morning temperatures allow highs to reach the mid-to-upper 40s. A slight chance of rain showers show up by late afternoon into evening."

-- Obama banned solitary confinement for juveniles in federal prisons, saying the practice is overused and has the potential for devastating psychological consequences. In an op-ed that appears in today's Post, the president outlines a series of executive actions that also prohibit federal corrections officials from punishing prisoners who commit "low-level infractions" with solitary confinement. "The new rules also call for expanding treatment for mentally ill prisoners," Juliet Eilperin scoops. "While the president’s reforms apply broadly to the roughly 10,000 federal inmates serving time in solitary confinement, there are only a handful of juvenile offenders placed in restrictive housing each year. Between September 2014 and September 2015, federal authorities were notified of just 13 juveniles who were put in solitary in its prisons." Read the op-ed here .

-- The creator of the anti-Planned Parenthood videos was indicted on felony charges. "A Houston grand jury that was investigating accusations of criminal misconduct against Planned Parenthood instead indicted the leader of an anti-abortion group that recorded covert videos of the organization’s employees," Danielle Paquette reports. "Harris County District Attorney Devon Anderson said David Daleiden, the director of the Center for Medical Progress, faces a felony charge of tampering with a governmental record and a misdemeanor count related to buying human tissue. Sandra Merritt, one of Daleiden’s employees, was also indicted on a charge of tampering with a governmental record. The grand jury cleared Planned Parenthood Gulf Coast of any wrongdoing. Texas Gov. Greg Abbott said, however, that the inspector general of the state’s Health and Human Services Commission and the Texas attorney general’s office would continue to investigate Planned Parenthood’s actions."

-- One week before Iowa, a brand new Washington Post/ABC News poll shows Donald Trump solidifying his national lead. “Republicans see Trump as the strongest candidate on major issues and by far the most electable in the large field of GOP hopefuls,” Dan Balz and Scott Clement write. The business mogul leads the national GOP field by 16 points, at 37 percent, with Ted Cruz placing 2nd, at 21 percent. Marco Rubio is in 3rd with 11 percent, followed by Ben Carson (7 percent) and Jeb Bush (5 percent). Trump’s supporters are more committed to him than those of his rivals, with 57 percent saying they will definitely vote for him (compared to 34 percent for all the other candidates). In a big shift, 6 of 10 Republicans see Trump as most likely to win the GOP nod, and The Donald leads among all demographic groups (including white evangelicals, though his strongest support comes from those with income under $50,000). Trump’s success appears bolstered by the finding that 9 in 10 GOPers say the country is seriously on the wrong track, and 8 in 10 are dissatisfied with the federal government. See the full results here .

-- The results are much closer in Iowa, where Trump leads Cruz by 2 points (31 to 29 percent) among likely Republican caucus-goers, according to new numbers released this morning by Quinnipiac University. Rubio places 3rd with 13 percent with no other candidate breaking 7 percent. The results are pretty much the same as the Q poll's Jan. 11 survey. Only 2 percent are undecided, though 39 percent of those who picked a candidate might change their minds.

-- The Democratic contest in the Hawkeye State is also narrowing. Clinton leads Sanders by 6 points (48 to 42 percent), down from 14 points in early December, according to a Fox News poll released last night. Bernie is gaining among men (a 2-point December edge grew is a 12-point advantage now), while Hillary is losing ground among those 45 and older and those with college degrees. Nationally , Clinton's numbers are also slipping, with 49 percent supporting her (down from 54 percent two weeks ago) compared to 37 percent for Sanders (also down, from 39 percent). Undecideds rose from 2 to 10 percent. The Fox News Poll says that the Clinton erosion comes partially from falling support among black voters, 67 percent of whom now back her (compared to 78 percent two weeks ago and 84 percent in December).

-- Christie failed to arrest Atlantic City's deline in the latest episode of our Decider series. --> "Atlantic City's Mr. Fix-It, " by David Fahrenthold: "Christie chose to intervene aggressively in Atlantic City's troubles, believing that a better governor — and a little more government — could overcome its steep economic decline. So first, Christie had the state take over half of the city. But that wasn't enough. So he tried a new casino. But that wasn't enough. So he tried Internet betting. But that wasn't enough … Despite Christie's efforts, four of the 12 casinos shut down. About 7,000 jobs were lost. His intervention went so badly that the state legislature is considering whether to revoke Atlantic City's last best lifeline, its state-sanctioned monopoly on gambling. The mayor — a fellow Republican, exasperated with Christie — is considering municipal bankruptcy. Christie's decision to intervene here reflects his style of governing: Confident. Pugnacious. Braggadocious. And sometimes unwilling to acknowledge the limits of his power."

-- "How David Petraeus avoided felony charges and possible prison time, " by Adam Goldman: "The Justice Department has never discussed how it reached its decision to accept a plea on the lesser charge. But six current and former U.S. officials, as well as others familiar with the case, provided the first detailed look at the internal debates and wrangling with Petraeus's lawyers that took place before the retired four-star general entered his guilty plea ... As part of the agreement, Petraeus admitted that he improperly removed and retained highly sensitive information in eight personal notebooks that he gave to [Paula] Broadwell. The Justice Department said the information, if disclosed, could have caused 'exceptionally grave damage.' Officials said the notebooks contained code words for secret intelligence programs, the identities of covert officers, and information about war strategy and deliberative discussions with the National Security Council. The plea agreement left some in the Justice Department angry, particularly at the FBI, and some agents have argued privately that it will hamper future efforts to secure prison terms in leak cases. But others in the government defended the deal as the only viable conclusion to a case in which a successful prosecution on the more serious charges was far from certain. 'Nobody was going to be happy with the outcome,' a former Justice Department official said. 'There was nothing about this case that was typical.'"

-- "Booming health care costs and growing deficits create budget headache for Republicans," by Kelsey Snell: "Congressional Republicans have promised to include deep spending cuts in their upcoming budget proposals and new data showing rising federal health care costs and a looming deficit increase will likely add to conservatives hunger for big funding reductions. Federal health care costs are expected to jump to $936 billion in 2016, outpacing the $882 billion projected spending on Social Security, according to a report released Monday by the Congressional Budget Office. … Republicans will likely use the latest data from CBO to justify proposing deep spending cuts to mandatory spending programs, but GOP leaders could face some tough questions when it comes to how much to provide for the 12 annual spending bills both Paul Ryan and Mitch McConnell want to move early this year. … Republican leaders agreed late last year to a deal that allows for $30 billion in new discretionary spending in fiscal 2017, an agreement that continues to rankle conservatives, particularly in the House."

Concepcion Picciotto, the protester who maintained a peace vigil outside the White House for more than three decades, a demonstration widely considered to be the longest-running act of political protest in U.S. history, died yesterday at a housing facility operated by N Street Village, a nonprofit that supports homeless women in Washington. She was believed to be 80. She had recently suffered a fall. Picciotto — a Spanish immigrant known to many as "Connie" or "Conchita" — was the primary guardian of the anti-nuclear-proliferation vigil stationed along Pennsylvania Avenue.

GOOD READS FROM ELSEWHERE:

-- New York Times, "Before rise as outsider, Ted Cruz played inside role in 2000 recount," by Matt Flegenheimer: "Mr. Cruz rarely invokes the 2000 race and recount. He has largely disavowed the comparatively moderate Bush wing of the Republican Party in pursuit of conservative ideological purity. Yet his initial venture into presidential politics is by turns a confirmation of and a complication for the professed Cruz image. The race installed Mr. Cruz as a creature of the Republican establishment — but also helped start his divorce from it. He made plenty of enemies among party operatives, according to interviews with over a dozen former colleagues, though for reasons that had little to do with ideology. ... By the end of five bleary-eyed weeks of hanging chads and butterfly ballots, Mr. Cruz had aggressively worked his legal connections, chafed when he felt sidelined by party veterans and — even in the view of some who disparage him — helped ensure Mr. Bush's victory in the courts, to a point. In fact, former colleagues say, the Ted Cruz of 2000 is entirely recognizable in the candidate now aspiring to the presidency himself, fusing hyper-intelligence, crackling ambition and a laundry list of impeccable insider credentials that he once ticked off more readily. 'He thought he should get the No. 1 policy job in the White House, and he was extremely ambitious,' said Ari Fleischer, Mr. Bush's former spokesman. 'In Ted's case in 2000, it backfired.'"

-- Hillary gives BuzzFeed an interview, "Clinton wants to talk to you about love and kindness," by Ruby Cramer: "Here is how Hillary Clinton sees herself: radically consistent, motivated by a core philosophy — voiced now through two words rarely associated with her. 'Love and kindness.' If this sounds unlikely, she knows it. For 50 years, she's struggled to explain the values that motivate her — in public life, as a candidate, as a person. The one time she really tried to, in the early 1990s, she was brutally mocked. In the view of some of her closest aides, Clinton never fully recovered from the critical backlash. … As Clinton sees it, she's really talking about a 'shorthand' for her personal and political beliefs, for all the impulses that shape what she does and how she does it. … Even if no one views her that way. Even if she's never been quite able to explain it. … Even if her earnest efforts to connect with people are hampered not just by her image, but by the actual barriers of public life. After so many years, how do you convince a nation full of people who think they know everything about you that they don't?"

-- Boston Globe, "Trump and Sanders lead the pack with big promises, " by Matt Viser and Annie Linskey: "Trump and Sanders have virtually nothing in common except for outsider status and pie-in-the-sky policy priorities, which they sell with highly charged emotional appeals targeted directly at voters' economic and social anxieties. Trump says he would build a wall along the Southern border, and make Mexico pay for it. ... He would temporarily ban Muslims from entering the United States ... He says he would force Apple to build all of its products in the United States ... In seeming disregard of US and global trade rules, he wants to slap a stiff, blanket tariff on imported Chinese goods. ... Sanders, the self-described democratic socialist, hews more closely to legal realities than Trump, but he still campaigns on an aspirational platform of political longshots. He vows to break up the big banks. He wants to give every student the option of going to college without paying for it. He envisions a health care system in which everyone is covered, including undocumented immigrants. He wants to mandate that employers pay for new parents to stay home with their babies for three months. While he says the United States should be more like Denmark, he neglects to mention that the Scandinavian country has a 55 percent income tax rate. The unrealistic nature of their promises is a startling feature of a 2016 campaign full of surprises, as candidates who once would have been dismissed as fringe play dominant roles."

-- Politico, "State Dept. watchdog tied to earlier Clinton probe," by Josh Gerstein: "A lawyer overseeing investigations into Hillary Clinton's email practices has a history of tangling with the former first lady's political operation: He was a federal prosecutor involved in a probe that led, a decade ago, to the unsuccessful prosecution of a top Clinton fundraising aide. David Seide — now the acting senior adviser to the State Department inspector general — gathered evidence that surfaced in the case against David Rosen, the national finance director of Clinton's 2000 Senate bid. Seide's tie to the Rosen case is fueling concerns among Clinton's allies that various inquiries relating to her use of a private email server are being skewed against her. However, the inspector general's office denies any conflict and says Seide's connection to the earlier prosecution was a remote one."

-- Politico, "When Cruz Wanted to Be Part of the Establishment," by Shane Goldmacher and Daniel Lippman: "Five years ago, as Cruz plotted his path to the U.S. Senate, the anti-establishment crusader sought a private audience with and the backing of one of the faces of the modern GOP establishment: George W. Bush. In a never-before-reported meeting in Bush's Dallas office, Cruz began to outline his 2012 campaign playbook for the former president … Cruz explained how he would consolidate conservatives yearning for a political outsider, how he would outflank the front-runner on the right, how he would proudly carry the mantle of the ascendant tea party to victory over entrenched elites. … Bush cut Cruz off before he could finish. 'I guess you don't want my support,' Bush interrupted. 'Ted, what the hell do you think I am?'"

Fox News said Trump is afraid of Megyn Kelly. Highlight #1
Nicole Wallace Talks Campaign Contributions, Ads and Energy (MSNBC 08/08/08 7:17am)
JOE SCARBOROUGH: [The bundler scandal] is sort of the equivalent of people in Northwest Florida having their hound dogs contribute to my campaigns. What's going on out there? Who are these strange people contributing to McCain's campaign?

NICOLE WALLACE: Wherever there's anything inappropriate, the flags are raised, the sirens go off and anything that is inappropriately raised is returned, but I think the money story of the week was the—

SCARBOROUGH: Hold on. That was inappropriate, though, right?

WALLACE: Sure and so corrections were made and any money that was inappropriate was returned.

SCARBOROUGH: What happened is a guy that bundled a lot of checks, sent it to McCain and there were some inappropriate checks in there.

WALLACE: I think it was a bundler's associate. So I think it was once removed from the bundler and I think—

SCARBOROUGH: From the bundler and he got checks from people who couldn't really afford to write those checks?

WALLACE: I think what we uncovered was that maybe they weren't whole-heartedly enthusiastic about John McCain's candidacy. So that raised red flags. The finance sirens went off and money was returned.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

SCARBOROUGH: So the money's been returned.

WALLACE: That's what I understand.

SCARBOROUGH: Okay. So now, let's segue. What do you think is the real campaign finance issue of the week?

WALLACE: The money story of the week is the day after Barack Obama launched his ad, John McCain, George Bush, blah, blah, blah, big oil—turns out Barack Obama has received more money from Exxon-Mobil and from oil than John McCain has. So even his attacks have, you know a—

MIKA BRZEZINSKI: Is that true?

WALLACE: —a suspension of reality. The Center for Responsive politics yesterday released some kind of fact check information about how it's actually Barack Obama who's—

SCARBOROUGH: Obama is getting more money from Exxon-Mobil?

WALLACE: —raised more money. It's on my Blackberry. I can forward it to you, but the point is—

SCARBOROUGH: We'll check with NBC.

WALLACE: —this is what gets lost in campaigns. It's not about who raises money from where. It's what are you going to do? Are you going to stand in the White House and do the difficult things and that's the big choice. It's great, this debate we've been having about energy. I think it's brought into focus a great choice between these two. We're not for entirely different things, we're just for more things, more things to make us energy independent.

SCARBOROUGH: We showed ads at the top. The McCain campaign showed democrats praising John McCain, but then democrats put out an ad that these same democrats, senators that have been favorable, were very, very critical. Are you all going to pull down the first ad now?

WALLACE: No. Certainly not. I think it's important for people to know that, over the years, John McCain has worked with democrats and we're in the heat of a political battle now. It's not surprise that they're going to, you know, pull back some of their high praise for John McCain, but he continues to feel warmly toward all of for them.

He continues believe that Senator Clinton broke every glass for women and I think he's proud of what she accomplished. He continues to feel very proud that Joe Lieberman is his partner in crime. They're in the senate making bipartisan compromise and getting things done. He's very proud of his relationships with democrats and republicans.

MIKA BRZEZINSKI: But these, ads—Chris is giving me information on the money in a second—but the ads in response, though, were the same people saying negative things about John McCain. Is it a wash?

WALLACE: You know, voters are going to make that determination, but I think voters understand. They've watched John McCain in the senate. They've watched him work with democrats. They've watched him really earn the ire of the president and republicans in congress as he reached across the aisle and got things done for the American people.

WILLIE GEIST: They're checking on you right now.

WALLACE: Fact check. Here we go.

SCARBOROUGH: Obama actually received $345,410 from the oil and gas industry, not $400,000, which is how much Clinton received, but you know what, the bottom line is, the fact that we're talking about all the money that Barack Obama got from the oil industry, the fact we just corrected it, actually is not helpful to Barack Obama because we're talking about a guy who got a lot of money from the oil industry who he now wants to tax.

WALLACE: Right.

GEIST: Nicole, we watch these polls every day—

SCARBOROUGH: By the way, […] did McCain vote for the energy bill […] a couple of years ago?

WALLACE: The one that Barack Obama—the Bush–

SCARBOROUGH: Yeah, yeah.

WALLACE: No. Barack Obama voted for it. So Barack O—

SCARBOROUGH: Okay he voted for it. He supported—I could not understand it. I was actually angry—sorry to cut you off, but I was angry with republicans a couple of years ago for voting for that energy bill because it gave tax cuts to oil companies.

WALLACE: It was also all mucked up with a lot of giveaways to special interests and that's what—.

SCARBOROUGH: Why don't you criticize him for that?

WALLACE: Well, we have and we've made this point that Barack Obama—I should take a note here—but we made a point that Barack Obama supported the Bush-Cheney energy bill and John McCain voted against it.

SCARBORUGH: The […] reason I brought that up, Willie, 'cause remember, I always wondered why Hillary Clinton didn't attack Barack Obama because, again, my attack, […] I was angry because republicans—it was right after hurricane Katrina, gas prices spiked. We couldn't find gas. In the midst of this horrible crisis, republicans voted for tax cuts for oil companies and Obama supported those cuts and I didn't know whether McCain did—

BRZEZINSKI: What we are getting, NBC News, is that McCain is at the top of the list as of June 30th, receiving something like a million dollars from oil companies. I just—I don't know where you're getting your numbers, but—

WALLACE: He didn't get much from it in that he voted against the energy bill, the Bush-Cheney energy bill that Barack Obama supported.

BRZEZINSKI: But that's—

WALLACE: I stand by what I said and I'll forward over the source that I learned that from, but—

SCARBOROUGH: Which was what was what? The center…?

WALLACE: The Center for Responsive Politics, which I think is pretty reputable as a straight source.

SCARBOROUGH: All right. We'll clear that up. Energy bill, we cleared that up too. Obama supported for the [sic] '05 energy bill, which republicans pushed and I thought it was a horrific bill. Go ahead, Willie.

GEIST: Nicole, we look at these polls every day […].

WALLACE: We don't look at any of them.

GEIST: […] it seems to be holding steady, as in, Barack Obama's not getting any distance, but John McCain's not making up any distance either. What's it going to take? What's the break in this campaign? What are you guys looking for?

WALLACE: I think it will be neck and neck until the end. I think—I hope we will all be up late on election night and hopefully John McCain who is the underdog in this race and I believe will remain the underdog until end. This is a historically rotten climate for republicans. The fact that he's running so strong is a tribute to his character and his record of working with these democrats, who I understand, in the last 60 days in election, have to recoil from all the positive things they've said about him, but these are his friends.

He's worked with democrats. He's done the difficult things. I think, at the end of the day, that's what Americans want.

GEIST: What's the one issue […]?

WALLACE: Drill, baby, drill.

BRZEZINSKI: There's our sound bite.

SCARBOROUGH: All right. not exactly what he campaigned on before. Not exactly what Charlie Crist campaigned on before, but, boy, the climate has changed.

Morning Joe Follows Up on Wallace's Oil Contributions Claim (MSNBC 08/08/08 7:33am)
JOE SCARBOROUGH: […] we got this email in—

MIKA BRZEZINSKI: From the McCain camp.

SCARBOROUGH: […] and they're actually quoting MSNBC's First Read, and […] according to the Center for Responsive Politics, Obama's actually raised more money from Exxon, through June, the center writes, 'Exxon employees have given Obama $42, 100. McCain's $35,000. Chevron also favors Obama. Chevron has given Obama more money, but BP has given McCain more money.'

So the entire oil industry's given McCain more, but Exxon employees have given Barack Obama more.

BRZEZINSKI: See, I knew there was some disconnect in what Nicole and we were talking about. There was two ways of looking at it.

Highlight #2
Rick Davis Scores Some Local Coverage (WKRC CBS OH 08/07/08 11:02pm)
ANCHOR: […] Not everyone was excited to see Senator McCain in Liberty Township this afternoon. Several dozen protestors with Progress Ohio gathered outside the McCain fundraiser. The group waved flags and held up signs critical of McCain's energy and economic policies and his support for the war.

KIT ANDREWS: Earlier today Senator McCain called for a federal investigation of a plan that could cost thousands of jobs in Wilmington. German shipping giant, DHL wants UPS to handle its domestic airfreight instead of having it go through its Wilmington air hub.

After meeting with residents and elected officials privately, McCain said the Justice Department should look into anti-trust issues. McCain's campaign manager, Rick Davis was among the lobbyist who helped DHL acquire the Wilmington hub in from Airborne Express in 2003.

McCain Assuages Local Worries over His Opposition to DHL-UPS Merger (WCPO ABC OH 08/07/08 11:01pm)
JAY WARREN: […] Senator McCain expressed concern today about the proposed merger between DHL and UPS and, after meeting there with employees in Wilmington, he then traveled to Liberty Township to visit the very people who helped secure Ohio for President Bush in 2004.

[Jeers from a crowd of demonstrators]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As the Straight Talk Express rolled into the Four Bridges Country Club, it was met both by protesters and a few supporters. Kristi Bown says McCain has her vote.

KRISTI BOWEN: I believe McCain has the knowledge, the experience and I believe he could be a good leader.

WARREN: Lillian Townsend, however, explained why he won't be getting hers.

LILLIAN TOWNSEND: Because I want more for the people of the United States and I feel, with all of us together, we can make a stand. We can do this.'

WARREN: Supporters paid a minimum of $250 for a chance to hear the Arizona senator. Republican voters in Butler and Warren counties hope to do for McCain what they did for President Bush in 2004.

Earlier today McCain spoke with DHL workers who stand to lose their jobs if the company merges with UPS.

JOHN MCCAIN: Should this happen DHL will cede significant elements of control over cost and service quality to one of its chief competitors this raises serious concerns that consumers all over America would suffer in terms of cost and quality in the services provided."

WARREN: He was persuaded to meet after a tearful request in July.

MCCAIN: I'm a strong supporter of our anti-trust laws and I believe they should be vigorously enforced. I fully support a federal anti-trust review of the case.

WARREN: If the deal goes through, a plan, he says, needs to be in place to take care of 8k plus workers who would lose their jobs.

JOSEPFH TEUCHERT: After this meeting I believe now he is one hundred percent against this Deutche post DHL-UPS merger and he will do everything in his power to stop this merger.

WARREN: Meanwhile back at the fundraiser Jack Kuntz and Steve Burns were hoping to give Senator McCain a ride in their electric car called the Amp. The Amp is a retro-fitted Saturn, they say, built right here in Cincinnati. They're answering McCain's call for providing electric vehicles.

WARREN: Now we checked McCain's campaign calendar and it seems like the senator will not compete with the Olympics and he'll get out of the spotlight, at least, for the moment. He doesn't have anything booked, at least, right now until the Republican Convention in September.

Highlight #3
Politifact's Bill Adair Labels McCain's Stance on Bush Tax Cuts a Full Flop and Legitimizes Obama's Tire Pressure Comments (MSNBC 08/08/08 06:42am)
WILLIE GEIST: There's been a lot of discussion about McCain's position on the Bush tax cuts; we've talked a lot about this. In a December interview he gave his reasons for supporting a measure to make the cuts permanent. Take a listen and then tell us where this lands on the flip-o-meter.

[Clip of McCain]
JOHN MCCAIN: "Spending went completely out of control. It's still out of control. Wasteful pork barrel and earmark spending is a disgrace and it cause us to alienate our Republican base. So these tax cuts need to be made permanent, otherwise they would have the effect of tax increases.

GEIST: Alright Bill, is he flipping on the Bush tax cut?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

BILL ADAIR: He is. We gave that a full flop. [...] That was a full flop. You know you go back to 2001 and 2003 and McCain voted against them. Made a point of saying that they didn't do enough for the middle class and that he was concerned about the price of the Iraq war. And then in 06' he voted in favor of them and still supports extending them so they would be permanent. A very clear full flop on the flip-O-meter.

HAROLD FORD: Now remember those ads where Democrats are praising him, a lot of it was based on his position on these various issues.

MIKA BREZEZINSKI: Gas tax holiday, puh-leeze.

GEIST: A lot of talk about the tire inflation campaign. [...] Here it is, tire gauge inflation. John McCain made fun of Barack Obama about this. Last Wednesday in a town hall, Barack Obama told the audience that American's could save as much gas by simply inflating our tires as we could by drilling offshore. McCain campaign bounced immediately on the statement. After the clip, tell us where Senator Obama's comments register on the truth-o-meter.

BARACK OBAMA: "There are things that you can do individually though to save energy, making sure your tires are properly inflated, simple things. But we could save all the oil that they talking about getting off drilling if we just inflate our tires. And getting regular tune-ups, you could save as much.

GEIST: Bill Adair, true or false?

ADAIR: We gave that one a true on the truth-O-meter. It's important to look at the way he said it. [...] In this particular statement, the way he said it, we interpret it to mean that he's referring to new drilling. And when you do the math and you look at it, indeed if everyone where to fully inflate their tires you would save more gasoline than we would get from the new drilling in offshore areas.

However, Republican presidential candidate Jeb Bush's brazen attempts to rewrite history in a series of campaign appearances last week cannot go unchallenged. By blaming President Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton for the rise of ISIL, Governor Bush is clearly seeking to absolve his brother's administration of responsibility for today's problems in Iraq. This argument may serve Governor Bush's political interests, but it does a disservice to the truth assumptions. They sent too few troops to secure the country. They replaced a government that was a sworn enemy of Iran with one that had close ties to the mullahs. They disbanded the Iraqi Army and dismissed thousands of Sunni officers, who soon launched a violent insurgency.

None of these facts were acknowledged by Governor Bush in his speech at the Ronald Reagan Presidential Library or in his recent campaign appearances in Iowa, because they undermine his attempts at blame shifting.

According to Bush's emerging narrative, the fatal U.S. error in Iraq was the withdrawal of our troops on December 31, 2011. If that is the case, then the error was made by President George W. Bush, who negotiated that withdrawal date in a binding agreement reached with Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki in 2008. The Obama administration sought to extend the mission for U.S. troops, and by all accounts Secretary Clinton strongly supported such a residual presence. But Prime Minister Maliki refused to give U.S. troops immunity from prosecution—and the administration wisely decided not to put U.S. troops at risk to support a government that did not want them there any longer.
It is these circumstances that Governor Bush believes led to the rise of ISIL, but once again, he is only telling part of the story. ISIL, which emerged from al Qaeda in Iraq, was established in 2003 in the chaos that followed the invasion. AQI became a magnet for disaffected Sunnis and remnants of Saddam Hussein's army, who still help lead ISIL.

No one, Democrat or Republican, would claim that all is going well in the Middle East today. The Obama administration has certainly made mistakes, and the Bush administration did not do everything wrong. We should also not fall into the trap of assuming everything is America's fault. Sectarian Iraqi leaders, the Assad regime in Syria and malign Iranian influence also bear responsibility for the tremendous problems facing the region.

Still, the United States has been and will be an important force in the Middle East. Our country does not need a backward-looking partisan fight over our policy in the region. Instead, we should be having a substantive, forward-looking discussion about the kind of role we can play in bringing stability to a critical part of the world.

To his credit, Governor Bush did present some ideas for how his administration would deal with Iraq. While his rhetoric has been lofty, and his criticism of President Obama and former Secretary Clinton has been sharp, the policies he proposes look remarkably similar to what the administration is already doing—supporting the Iraqi military in their fight against ISIL. The areas where he appears to differ are his willingness to put more U.S. lives at risk by sending troops into combat, and his unwillingness to rule out waterboarding in interrogations.
Governor Bush also spoke of the importance of alliances, but his rhetoric and proposed actions would jeopardize these important sources of strength. Nothing would infuriate our European allies more than Governor Bush's plan to break away from the nuclear agreement with Iran that they spent years negotiating alongside us. Similarly, Governor Bush made a point of using the term "Islamic terrorists," a phrase that our allies in the Arab world have pressed us not to use because it feeds the false narrative that we are at war with a religion.

Words matter in the world of diplomacy, and so does leadership. The reputation of the United States was severely damaged during President' Bush's administration. Today, America's place in the world is far stronger than it was in 2009 thanks to the leadership of President Obama and former Secretary Clinton. They renewed alliances, relentlessly pursued our terrorist enemies, and forged international coalitions on Iran sanctions and on the fight against climate change. That's a laudable record of achievement—one that needs no re-writes.

In the months ahead, I would encourage Mr. Bush to be a true student of foreign policy rather than a hurler of political potshots. The United States cannot afford another President Bush who blinds himself to global reality and who forges ahead into chaos. Americans deserve a president who will acknowledge the past and will forge a better future.

Some of the hard contrast is stuff from a very long time ago. The second graf makes it sound like he is currently proposing those things. Same for the national security graf.

Subject: Re: Agenda for 5:30 Post NH Messaging Call - TESTING SUGGESTIONS

Jim Andrews and I have been pouring through the oppo and have a couple new possible negatives to suggest we test in the poll, since most of our attacks haven't been working. We also proposed language for a split message test between where we've been (ideas that sound good on paper/ can't wait) versus the new no barriers message -- stacked up against Sanders

Hope these are helpful.

YOU PAY FOR SOCIALISM

Bernie Sanders says he wants to restructure America's economy to make it work like it does in the socialist countries of Europe, providing things like free health care for everyone, free college for everyone, and free increases in Social Security for everyone. But Sanders does not mention that the middle class picks up the bill in these countries, paying nearly sixty percent of their income in taxes, three times what middle class Americans pay now.

FREE STUFF FOR EVERYBODY

Bernie Sanders said –quote– "all necessities of life must be provided free for people," and over the years he's proposed a radical restructuring of the entire American economy to make many things free, from the gas for people's cars to telephones and now free college and health care. To do this, Sanders proposed the complete government takeover of all oil companies, gas companies, electric utility companies, phone companies, health care companies, and all television networks. Combined, Sanders proposals would put the government in control of more than half of the American economy, but Sanders has never told anyone who would pay for all of this or how it would work.

SPEND, TAX AND COVER IT UP

Bernie Sanders' spending plans cost at least eighteen trillion dollars, would increase government spending by 50% and equal the size of the current national debt. And it's actually worse. Experts say Sanders health care plan alone is quote –twice as expensive as he says it is and they say Sanders plans would increase middle class taxes by one third, even for people making less than nineteen thousand a year, and Sanders plans would raise the top tax rate to seventy seven percent. The Boston Globe said –quote "Sanders is not leveling with voters" about the real cost of his spending plans.

EXTREME ON NATIONAL SECURITY

Bernie Sanders' extreme views would gut America's national security and make less safe. Sanders ran for Congress calling for the military budget to be cut by more than half and spending the money on a "major electrified rail system" instead. In Washington, Sanders sponsored a law to unilaterally terminate America's entire nuclear weapons program and sponsored another law to cut the nuclear submarine fleet in half. In Congress, Sanders proposed massive cuts in the intelligence budget and earlier said we should shut down the entire CIA because –quote they "might even be able to overthrow the U.S. government if they chose to." Sanders is so ideologically committed to military cuts that just last year he said –quote we shouldn't spend money on the military "even if it does create jobs."

TROUBLING PATTERN ON CAMPAIGNING

Bernie Sanders says he's running a different kind of campaign, but the record tells another story. Last year a Sanders affiliated political action committee was fined by the federal election commission and Sanders staffers were caught hacking into computers and stealing data on political opponents. This year, Sanders got caught running ads that said he was endorsed by newspapers that actually endorsed his opponent and was forced to remove ads from the air. Sanders got caught claiming endorsements from organizations that endorsed his opponent and the American Legion is now threatening to sue him for falsely claiming he has their support.

TROUBLING PATTERN ON WOMEN

Bernie Sanders says he supports women's rights, but has a pattern of expressing and tolerating extreme views on women. Sanders once wrote that men fantasize about women being on their knees and women fantasize about being raped by three men simultaneously. Sanders wrote another article that connecting women's sexual behavior to breast cancer and said the way parents teach their daughter about sex –quote– "very well determine whether or not she will develop breast cancer." Now Sanders' supporters are flooding the internet with troubling comments about women quote –voting with their vaginas– and calling women who support Hillary Clinton quote –bitches.

BERNIE VS HRC MESSAGE TEST

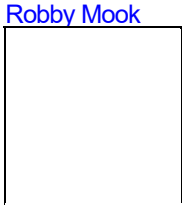
BERNIE

Bernie Sanders says we have a corporate establishment whose greed is destroying the economy and a corrupt political establishment beholden to billionaires. Sanders says the billionaire class can't get huge tax breaks and hide profits overseas while the middle class is being hollowed out. Sanders says corporate America and the billionaire class have to start paying their fair share, and that to change things we need a political revolution to undo the power of corporate America and Wall Street. You sure can't change a corrupt system by taking its money. Sanders says one person alone can't change this country, but we can do it together.

HRC: BARRIERS

Hillary Clinton says we need to break down barriers of social injustice. Clinton says racism and sexism and other forms discrimination are not simply an effect of economic inequality, but are also part of the cause of economic inequality. Clinton says she will hold Wall Street accountable, but Wall Street is not gunning down young African Americans or denying immigrants a path to citizenship. Clinton says we can't move forward when women make seventy eight cents for each dollar men make, when people can be fired just because they're gay or when African American men go to prison at the same rate they graduate college. Clinton says that America can't reach its full potential when you're held back from reaching yours.

HRC CAN'T WAIT



Hillary Clinton says she is not interested in ideas that sound good on paper but will never make it the real world, and she won't make promises she can't keep. Clinton says the single mom who needs raise can't wait for plans that will never happen. The student with a mountain of debt can't wait. The grandmother who has to choose between paying for medicine and paying the rent can't wait. Clinton says she's spent a lifetime making a difference for people and getting results, from winning benefits for the National Guard and Reserve to winning health care for eight million children and she's ready to roll up her sleeves and get to work right now. Clinton says she's ready to tackle our toughest challenges and move our country forward.

JOHN DICKERSON: not if hillary clinton can help it we'll hear from clinton this morning as she prepares to confront sanders in tonight's democratic debate in charleston. check in with marco rubio and john kasich both battling it out to stay alive after the voting begins. all coming up on "face the nation." captioning sponsored by cbs good morning welcome to "face the nation" i'm john dickerson. breaking news this morning, three americans including washington reporter jason, part of the prisoner exchange with iran announced on the day sanctions were lifted on that country as part of the iranian nuclear deal. and this video shows three of the iranians just preloosed in houston. this is a swap that's already sparked controversy on the campaign trail. we start with former secretary of state, hillary clinton, who is in charleston this morning. good morning, secretary clinton. after this prisoner exchange senator marco rubio said, quote, if you take an american hostage, barack obama will cut a deal with you whether it's bergdahl now what he's done with iran. your reaction to that?

HILLARY CLINTON: well, i think it's just typical political rhetoric, overlooks some very basic, important issues, number one, we al to get americans back who are unjustly held. i certainly did when i was secretary of state. and when i was a senator i advocated for the bush administration to do the same for people who have been unlawfully held in foreign counsel trees. secondly, the important news here is that the iranian agreement to put a lid on the nuclear weapons program of iran is being implemented. iranians have so far fulfilled their side of the bargain by destroying centrifuges, shipping out 98% or so of their enriched uranium out of their country, even making one of their plutonium reactors under construction no longer able to be ever used because they poured cement into it. so, the real issue here is, if you're committed to making the world safer and show strong american leadership you have to engage in patient, persistent diplomacy with people who are not your friends, they are on the other side of a lot of the issues and values that you hold very dear, that certainly true for the united states.

JOHN DICKESON: former fbi agent is still in iran, do you believe that the iranians know where he is and if so why wasn't he a part of this deal?

HILLARY CLINTON: well, i regret deeply that bob levinson was not on his way home either. i hope and expect that the iranians will continue to be pressed very, very hard to give up any information they have and if possible to return bob levinson to his home and family.

JOHN DICKERSON: switching to the topic of gun control, you said bernie sanders should support the idea of lifting immunity block on gun manufacturers, now says he'll support the legislation you pushed him to. so hasn't he done what you wanted him to do?

HILLARY CLINTON: well, i am pleased that senator sanders has flip-floppedonal immunity for gun makers and sellers, now i hope he will also join members of congress to change what's called the charleston loophole that enabled the killer in charleston to get the gun that he used to murder nine people at bible study here in mother emmanuel church, that's something else senator sanders supported that we need to change. so, now i'm calling on him to also flip flop in the right direction and sign on to legislation to change the charleston loophole.

JOHN DICKERSON: you at once in 1939 when you were first lady supported testimony in front of the senate finance committee a 25% tax on guns, you're not supporting that now or promoting that now. how have you evolved over the years in terms of your support for the second amendment?

HILLARY CLINTON: i do support the second amendment. that is always been understood. i just believe that like any amendment to our constitution there are reasonable steps that can be taken. we have reasonable restrictions on certain kind of speech or certain forms of assembly. for goodness sakes we ought to be smart enough and do so consistent with the constitution to have more gun safety measures to try to save some of the 3,000 lives that we lose to gun violence every single year. this is something that i have spoken out about. that i have advocated for right now. i think there is a consensus in the country on comprehensive background checks, closing the gun show loophole, closing the online and charleston loopholes, reversing the immunity given to the gun industry, certainly prohibiting would-be terrorist on the no fly zone, that's the common sense approach that we should be boxing to achieve.

JOHN DICKERSON: the stories out of flint, michigan, lead levels in the water have created an emergency there. senator sanders called for rick schneider, the governor to resign, what is your feeling?

HILLARY CLINTON: well, john, this is an issue i've been involved in now for couple of weeks. i am horrified by what happened in flint. i started calling for immediate action, calling for federal intervention, i sent two of my top campaign aides to meet with the mayor of flint as you may know, i appeared on show this past week and demanded that governor schneider ask for the help that michigan needs to deal with the horrible consequences that children and their families are facing in flint. i saw that governor schneider turned around within two hours finally asked for the help that he should have asked for some weeks ago. i don't want to get caught up in the political back and forth here, i want to help the people of flint. and i particularly want a comprehensive health analysis of what's hamed to these children, lead is a poison, it destroys your brain. it interferes with your learning and your behavior. whatever it takes for michigan and the federal government to come together to fema through health and human services, the epa, whatever it takes, we now have to fix a problem and help these kids and especially their health and education development probably for years to come.

JOHN DICKERSON: topic of health care backat the national level, your daughter chelsea in which son said senator sanders universal health care plan will dismantle obamacare, dismantle children's health insurance programs and series of other things would dismantle. isn't she and your campaign not taking into account that those things would be replaced by an actual plan that senator sanders has put forward?

HILLARY CLINTON: well, i think it's very confusing because he hasn't put forward a plan. and the only way we know what it is he's advocating for comes from looking at the nine bills that he's introduced in the house and senate and congress. in those bills every kind of health care is rolled all up together and handed over to the state which bear a financial responsibility to match what the federal government provides in order to administer health care. so, it's not a traditional kind of single-payer system as i understand it. it is a state-based system kind of similar to medicaid, if you will. and i do think there are very legitimate questions that can be raised, because we don't have an up to date plan from senator sanders all of us trying to figure out what it would mean for everybody to be put into that new system.

JOHN DICKERSON: senator, excuse me -- secretary clinton that may come up this evening when you're on stage.

HILLARY CLINTON: great to talk to you again, john.

Destruction of Beit El Buildings Begins amid Riots

Destruction began Wednesday after the High Court upheld a decision to tear down two controversial housing structures known as the Draynoff buildings in the West Bank settlement of Beit El after nearly two days of violence between settlers and police at the scene. Justice Minister Ayelet Shaked pointed out that despite the court's decision, the Draynoff buildings will most likely be reconstructed shortly after being torn down. Land permits from the structures were only acquired after their construction, making them illegal according to the court's ruling. Subsequently acquired land permits makes reconstruction likely.

Under Pressure, PM Approves Settlement Const.

Following pressure from Likud and Habayit Hayehudi lawmakers, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu announced once more the approval of immediate construction of 300 housing units in the West Bank settlement of Beit El. Following Netanyahu's announcement, Yoav Mordechai, the coordinator of government activities in the territories, signed a permit to immediately sell land for the construction of 296 new housing units in Beit El. The municipality will be able to issue construction permits within 15 days. The units' construction was already approved following the evacuation of the Beit El neighborhood known as Ulpana Hill, but was never carried out. In addition, Netanyahu approved moving forward with the planning of 500 new housing units in Jewish neighborhoods in East Jerusalem.

Rightist MK: High Court must be Bulldozed

The High Court decision to order the state to demolish two illegally built structures in the West Bank settlement of Beit El elicited harsh reactions from the Right on Wednesday. MK Moti Yogev of the pro-settler Bayit Yehudi party said in response that "we should ride up in D-9 bulldozers and raze the High Court of Justice to the ground." Yogev made the remarks before entering a meeting of the Knesset Foreign Affairs and Defense Committee. Yogev's Bayit Yehudi colleague, Justice Minister Ayelet Shaked, preached moderation, saying the state must respect the rule of law "and accept the High Court ruling and the harsh decree" ordering the demolition of homes in Beit El.

Livni: Events in Beit El ans Sanur Damage the Israeli Interest

Zionist Union MK Tzipi Livni attacked the settlers who returned to Sa-Nur: "If some Palestinian thought that we disengaged from Gaza to build more in Judea and Samaria, that was not the intent. In an absurd manner, the phenomena that we are seeing in Sa-Nur and in other places, these are phenomena that damage Israel's ability to protect the settlement blocs."

PM, Abbas may Address the EU to Reinvigorate Peace Process

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas could address European heads of state in the near future as part of a push by the international community to jump-start the peace process. To date, no Israeli prime minister has addressed the EU since its inception in 1993. In 1995, Shimon Peres, who was then the foreign minister and acting prime minister, visited Brussels, but did not formally speak to the body as a whole.The possibility of an EU address was first raised by Cypriot President Nicos Anastasiades during his visit to Jerusalem last month, and he raised it again during Netanyahu's visit to his island country on Tuesday. "I would welcome the opportunity to present Israel's position to the EU," Netanyahu said. "I think this is a very worthwhile initiative that you, Nicos, have brought up.

Sen. Feinstein Urges PM Not to Demolish S ussia

Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-CA) urged Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu on Tuesday to stop Israel's efforts to raze the Palestinian village of Sussia in the West Bank, saying that uprooting the village's residents would further isolate Israel, increase tensions with the Palestinians and provoke unnecessary violence. "Demolishing Palestinian homes, displacing residents, and seizing additional Palestinian territory in the West Bank is a step away from peace. To preserve land for a future Palestinian state, your government must not destroy Susiya [sic]," the senator wrote in a letter. Feinstein gave a detailed account of Sussia's history and legal battle facing the Civil Administration, noting that the village has existed at least since the 1830s.

Several K illed in R eported Israeli S trike in Syria

Several people were killed in a reported Israeli airstrike on a car in the Syrian Golan Heights near the border with Israel Wednesday. The three men killed were identified as members of militias affiliated with Iran, according to Lebanese media. The Britain-based Syrian Observatory for Human Rights reported that five people were killed in the strike. "An Israeli plane hit a car inside the town of Hader, killing two men from Hezbollah, and three men from the pro-regime popular committees in the town," said Rami Abdel Rahman, director of the watchdog. Hader is a Druze village that lies along the ceasefire line, with the Israeli portion of the Golan Heights plateau to the west, and the border with Damascus province to the northeast.

Israeli Spy Pollard to be Released in November

A federal parole board has ruled that Jonathan Pollard, a former US Navy intelligence officer convicted of spying for Israel, will be released in November after serving a 30-year prison sentence, his attorneys said on Tuesday. Pollard, who has remained jailed for decades despite efforts by successive Israeli governments to secure his early release, will be required to remain in the United States for five years under the terms of his parole, the attorneys said in a statement. They said he had the assurance of having a job and a home in the New York area, but they nevertheless ask US President Obama to waive that parole requirement and allow him to go to Israel after his release.

Israel Could Lose America's Democrats for a Generation

If the nuclear deal collapses, U.S. liberals will never forgive Israel for its starring role in a catastrophic turn of events.

By James Traub

Last week, I went to hear Secretary of State John Kerry defend the Iran nuclear deal at the Council on Foreign Relations. Richard Haass, president of the organization, began by asking Kerry to explain what "we have gained by this agreement." The first thing the secretary said was that he was "very proud" of his "100 percent voting record for Israel" as a senator. The second thing he said was that nobody had worked harder than he had to bring peace to the Middle East. The third thing was, "I consider Bibi" — Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu — "a friend." What we have gained, Kerry summed up, is "safety and security … for Israel and the region."

I found it astonishing that Kerry had answered a question about the most consequential diplomatic agreement the United States has signed over the last four decades as if he were the foreign minister of another country. Wasn't the "we" in question "the American people"? Of course, Kerry's political instincts were perfectly accurate. He knows that he and President Barack Obama don't need to persuade the Democratic left of the deal's merits and needn't bother trying to convert Republican conservatives. He needs to reach the people who view American national security as not just inextricable but indistinguishable from Israeli security.

On the way out, I saw once such personage and asked, jokingly, whether he had come around on the deal. He hadn't, of course, but he conceded that he would have to live with it. On the other hand, he added darkly, he knew very well what would happen if Congress voted against the agreement and then overrode Obama's veto: "They'll blame the Jews."

No, they won't. Most Americans who hate the Jews also hate Obama and Iran, and so will be happy to see the deal go up in smoke. Maybe they'll thank the Jews. What will happen, though, if Congress overrides Obama's veto — thus destroying the signal foreign-policy achievement of his tenure, humiliating the president before the world, and triggering a race for nuclear weapons capacity in Iran and across the Middle East — is that Democrats will blame Netanyahu and Israel. And it won't just be the American left, which already regards Israel as an occupying power. The fraying relationship between Israel and the Democratic Party will come apart altogether. Pro-Israel Democrats like Hillary Clinton will have to begin calculating how high a price they're prepared to pay for their continued support.

Am I exaggerating? Consider the geopolitical math. Until recently, critics of the proposed nuclear deal could claim that "our allies in the region" believed that it threatened their security. But last week, the Saudi foreign minister blessed the deal, if rather halfheartedly. The president of the United Arab Emirates and the emir of Kuwait sent congratulatory notes to Iran, though that still falls short of an endorsement. "Our allies" will not continue to lobby against the deal; only Israel will.

Now consider the congressional math. To override a presidential veto in the Senate, opponents of the deal will need to find 67 votes. All 54 Republicans seem prepared to vote against the president — many of them gleefully. But 13 Democrats must be prepared to defy their president on a question that will help define his place in history. How many of them would take such a stand if, say, the Saudis and the Emiratis opposed the deal and Israel favored it? How would Chuck Schumer, the New York senator and third-ranking Democrat, vote? Do we even have to ask? (So far, the senator has said only that he plans to "carefully study" the language of the deal.) Such is Schumer's influence among liberal Democrats that he could single-handedly scuttle the deal by voting against the measure.

I have no reason to doubt that Schumer sincerely believes that Kerry might be wrong, and Netanyahu right, about the dire effects that the nuclear deal would have on Israel's security. And I know that many Israelis, and not just die-hard Likudniks, appear to believe that a military strike on Iran, with all its calamitous consequences, would be better for their security than the agreement Obama has struck. (See, for example, this column in the leftist Haaretz by Ari Shavit, a journalist and the author of the acclaimed My Promised Land.) Maybe Schumer thinks so too.

I think that calculus is crazy. But Israelis know their neighborhood a lot better than I do. In any case, because Israel is far more directly threatened by Iran than the United States is, the merits of the case are different for Tel Aviv than for Washington. Each side insists that the other is wrong about its own national security interests, but the truth is that those interests do not exactly coincide. Why should they?

Of course Kerry can't say, "This is a great deal for the United States, even if it's a slightly less great deal for Israel." Political reality compels him to sustain the myth that those interests cannot diverge. Nevertheless, I find it offensive that Kerry had to indulge in such contortions in order to demonstrate his bona fides toward Israel. Meanwhile, his "friend" Netanyahu has received the administration's endless stream of entreaties with contempt — a fact that Kerry not very obliquely acknowledged by referring in his speech to unnamed "people" who "rant and rave" about the agreement, including "the prime minister with a cartoon of a bomb at the U.N."

Yet Kerry and Obama must continue trying to reach Americans who defer to Netanyahu as the arbiter of American national security. Those who say, "I will never choose between Israel and the United States" are being disingenuous. They are choosing.

Netanyahu threw down the gauntlet with the Obama administration a long time ago; perhaps he thinks he has nothing left to lose. But that's almost certainly not true. If 13 Democrats heed the Israeli siren song and the nuclear deal collapses, only a fantasist can believe that Iran will come back for a new and harsher deal or that the United Nations and the European Union will hang tough on sanctions. Instead, Iranian centrifuges will start spinning once again, while Pakistani scientists carrying nuclear blueprints will make clandestine visits to Saudi Arabia. Netanyahu will then take the game one step further by calling for airstrikes against Iranian facilities. If he succeeds — which I doubt — Americans will never forgive Israel for its role in a catastrophic decision.

Benjamin Netanyahu has made it clear that he is perfectly prepared to pay that price. Can Chuck Schumer say the same? I would suggest that his higher obligation would be to protect Israel from its own worst instincts.

Al Monitor – July 29, 2015

No Financial, Judicial Control over Israeli Settlement Enterprise

By Akiva Eldar

Even before world powers signed the nuclear deal with Iran, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu had already determined that its inspection mechanisms were full of holes. At an air force flight school graduation ceremony on June 25, Netanyahu warned that the "many tens of billions of dollars" that will flow into Iran's coffers once sanctions are lifted will serve, among other things, to expand its conquests in the Middle East. The issue of the supervision over Iran's nuclear facilities keeps taking center stage in the campaign Netanyahu is waging against the agreement among members of Congress and the American media. "You don't have inspections within 24 hours — you have 24 days before you can inspect any site that you find suspicious in Iran," Netanyahu said in an interview with NBC's Lester Holt. "Can you imagine giving a drug dealer 24 days' notice before you check the premises? That's a lot of time to flush a lot of meth down the toilet."

There's no doubt that with a country such as Iran, which has gained a deserved reputation for hiding facilities and material that can be used to build nuclear weapons, signing a piece of paper is not enough. Internal operating procedures and external inspection mechanisms are an integral component of any agreement resolving or managing a conflict. Without exception. But it is only fitting that anyone demanding tighter inspections of his neighbor's backyard take care of his own first. As the Babylonian Talmud says, "Remove the beam from between your eyes" (Arachin 16b), meaning, "Practice what you preach." Every house built in the occupied territories sits on a sufficient amount of dynamite to blow up any chance of ending the conflict with the Palestinians or forging regional peace.

The dynamite of the settlement enterprise, established in 1967, is produced without supervision, in violation of international law and often in contravention of Israeli law. Some quarter of a million settlers have joined the 110,000 Jews who lived in the West Bank at the time the Oslo Accord was signed in September 1993. Not only is the government not supervising the implementation of its commitment under the 2003 Road Map to freeze construction in the settlements and dismantle outposts, last week elected Israeli officials promoted a bill legalizing the lawlessness in its backyard. The government's Legislative Affairs Committee approved on July 19 a proposed bill anchoring the status of the Settlement Division — a department in the World Zionist Organization that serves as one of the state's central settlement construction arms. Three days later, the Knesset gave the bill preliminary approval by a vote of 65 to 41.

The ministers and Knesset members who supported the legislation — including the representatives of the farming communities in the Zionist Camp, Knesset members Eitan Broshi and Danny Atar — ignored the objections of the Ministry of Justice professional cadre to the bill and the pre-election commitment of their party leader, Isaac Herzog, to shut down the Settlement Division if elected prime minister.

A legal opinion compiled by Deputy Attorney General Dina Zilber, seconded by her boss, Attorney General Yehuda Weinstein, says that it is counter-procedural to have a nongovernmental operative channel that acts as a state branch and implements government decisions without this channel being fully subjected to proper administrative regulations and framework. The senior legal official said, "There is an inherent concern that this situation could create a kind of backyard for the government to carry out activities not in the framework of the law and could create fertile ground for the development of inherent pathologies."

A document issued last November by the Knesset's Research and Information Center provides a glimpse into one of the most obvious symptoms of this pathology. It reveals that in recent years, the Settlement Division's annual budget has run to 500-600 million Israeli shekels ($132-158 million) — more than the budget of some government ministries. In 2013, the division's original budget — approved as part of the annual state budget — was 82.3 million shekels ($22 million). But the budget it was effectively allocated that year amounted to some 653 million shekels ($172 million). In other words, during the year, various Knesset committees approved additional funding to the tune of 570 million shekels ($150 million), or a 670% increase. If one examines the spending increase according to geographic areas, the largest chunk was allotted to the central region, which includes the settlements of the Jordan Valley, the Binyamin Regional Council, the Etzion bloc and Samaria. The budget for this region ballooned by more than 2,000% in 2013 compared to the original sum approved in the state budget.

"Such an extensive budget illustrates the power and magnitude, the extent of the authority, and the tremendous scope for promoting and setting policy that has been entrusted to the [Settlement] Division," Zilber wrote. She recommended that the state take back the authority handed to the division following the 1967 Six-Day War. A similar recommendation is gathering dust in a report on settlement outposts, submitted by state attorney Talia Sasson to the government at then-Prime Minister Sharon's request in March 2005. Sasson found that the Settlement Division had funded, among other things, illegal outposts, including some erected on private Palestinian land.

Former Justice Minister Tzipi Livni of the Zionist Camp headed at the time a ministerial committee charged with implementing the Sasson report. This week she voted against the new law, calling it "a bill that bypasses the authority of the government's legal adviser," and claiming that it was designed to funnel money under the table to the settlements.

Minister Ayelet Shaked, who now occupies Livni's chair at the Ministry of Justice, objected that the government legal adviser and his deputies issue written opinions that contradict the government stance. She reprimanded Zilber for issuing and sending her criticizing opinion to Knesset member Merav Michaeli of the Zionist Camp. This, despite the fact that Zilber's written opinion was in line with statements by the government's legal adviser eight years ago, by which the Settlement Division should adopt rules similar to the Freedom of Information Law. But, although most of its budget is provided by the public, to this day the Settlement Division is exempt from providing the public with an account of how its funds are spent.

And as if this were not enough, the makeup of the Supreme Court, which to a large extent supervises the rule of law and justice in the territories, is about to change. In the newly named judicial appointments panel, the right wing enjoys a majority, including Knesset member Robert Ilatov, who pledges to supervise the lips of Arab candidates to make sure they mumble the words of the national anthem describing the "yearning of the Jewish soul." Ilatov told Israeli Army radio, "A judge who cannot sing Hatikvah cannot rule on cases in Israel."

Left-wing organizations and human rights activists remain the main source of information about the settlement enterprise. The government wishes to silence that information channel too. Deputy Foreign Minister Tzipi Hotovely is demanding that European states that donate funds to those organizations establish a supervision mechanism for the funding of Israeli nongovernmental organizations. She threatens that if they refuse, the government will advance proposed legislation that has been prepared. Really.

Who gave nongovernmental organization Peace Now permission to reveal to the world two weeks ago that the civil administration secretly allocated 300 dunams (74 acres) for the expansion of the settlement of Efrat in the heart of the West Bank? How dare B'tselem document settler harassment of Palestinian farmers. How come Yesh Din activists report on the lack of government enforcement against Israelis living on land that Israel rules by force? Israelis do not submit to supervision.

Dear Jake and John:

I'm sending this to you at the suggestion of my friend Lorraine Hariton. By way of introduction, back in 1980 I helped Norman Lear create People For the American Way -- even before Tony Podesta came into the picture. I spent months traveling across the country with Norman meeting with so many people to talk about the rise of something Norman was seeing -- the rise of the Religious Right and its impact on our politics. You know the rest.

Currently, I am one of the producers of a film adaptation of the award wining children's classic, A Wrinkle in Time, that Jennifer Lee (FROZEN) is scripting for Disney. I mention this, because this book has meant a great deal to millions of young people over the past 50 years. Even Sheryl Sandberg was quoted in the New York Times during an interview for her book, Lean In, that A Wrinkle in Time was her favorite childhood book.

Wrinkle was written in 1962 and received the Newberry Award for children's literature in 1963, the year I first read it. As you will read in this note, 1963 was quite a tumultuous year. The year before, in 1962, the Cuban missile crisis threatened the world with the possibility of nuclear war. Against a backdrop of uncertainty, death, and fear, A Wrinkle in Time, came along at a time when young people needed a way to understand the changing world around them. It wasn't necessarily a conscious need, more a longing or yearning for a way to comprehend the evil that existed, and to feel comforted by a story that helped us see that it could be overcome. I think the need for a vision of a loving and empathetic universe is as needed today as it was 50 years ago.

I'm writing a book about my 50 year journey to make Wrinkle into a movie and have been doing research on the past 5 decades which moved me to write this note to Lorraine this morning.

Lorraine-

Just wanted to send along a few thoughts re today's Post story on HRC. First, hope you are enjoying your time in NY. The emails and phone calls about the campaign are very helpful.

Something struck me in reading the Post piece that you may want to consider. When Hillary speaks of the email issue or other issues, her counter is "politics as usual." Those very words are what contribute to the general feeling of her tone deafness. I have no idea what is said in your discussions, but I assume lots of very smart, savvy people are thinking about this problem everyday. Most people do not know what she really means when she says "politics as usual' and it might help her if she were more precise in her reply. What I mean by that is not to use words that mean something to people who follow politics, but use words that mean something to people who don't. And, "politics as usual' is immediately heard as "politics as usual in Clinton-world."

Take every single opportunity she has to explain in the simplest way over and over again that she represents change to a more conservative way of thinking and rather than talk about the need for inclusivity in all things for all Americans, her opponents only want to instill fear about her as a person and the change she represents.

I've been doing a little research on the big historical events over the past 50 years and it is a real awakening to take in how much change this country has been dealing with ever since 1963.

Hillary's candidacy is an accumulation of a 50-year shift in attitudes and ever since the early 1970s a backlash to this change has taken shape and strengthened. It's not a vast right wing conspiracy - it is real fear of change. When she uses the words 'politics as usual' it only helps to strengthen that backlash.

She needs to be seen and heard as someone who can lead us to a more empathetic world where we can learn to actually get along with those who are different than us.

Take a look at what happened in 1963:

George Wallace became Governor of Alabama and proclaimed "segregation now, segregation tomorrow, and

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

segregation forever. “

Betty Friedan’s The Feminine Mystique launched the reawakening of the women’s movement in the United States as women’s organizations and consciousness raising groups spread.

70,000 marchers arrived in London to demonstrate against nuclear weapons.

Martin Luther King, Jr. issued his Letter from Birmingham Jail.

The US Supreme Court ruled that state-mandated Bible reading in public schools was unconstitutional.

Pope Paul VI succeeded Pope John XXIII and continued the Vatican Council II. Priests were now asked to celebrate Mass in the language of the countries in which they lived, face the congregation, and not only to be heard and seen but also to signal to worshippers that they were being included because they were a vital component of the service. No longer was prayer to be seen as a performance, but active participation.

The United States, United Kingdom, and Soviet Union signed a nuclear test ban treaty.

Martin Luther King, Jr delivered his I Have A Dream speech on the steps of the Lincoln Memorial to an audience of 250,000 people participating in the March on Washington for Jobs and Freedoms.

South Vietnamese President Diem was assassinated following a military coup.

“ I Want to Hold Your Hand” and “ I Saw Her Standing There” were released in the U.S., marking the beginning of Beatlemania on an international level.

President John F. Kennedy was assassinated.

And the 1970s became fertile ground for even more divisiveness:

As the protests against the Viet Nam war intensified, the backlash began to take shape. When Richard Nixon won the presidency in 1968 he dismantled programs put in place by President Johnson’s War on Poverty. The anti-war protests increased in frequency and no longer only w ere students protesting, but professors, scientists, and stay at home mothers.

In response to protesters, hippies and the new drug culture, President Nixon’s ‘silent majority,’ -- mostly white working and middle class voters, were angry at what they saw as the destruction of a country they had known and loved.

The nation seemed to tear apart at the seams as America watched the live coverage of the Watergate hearings. When President Nixon finally resigned from office in 1974 the seeds of government mistrust were firmly rooted.

The women’s rights movement took hold when Congress approved the Equal Rights Amendment (ERA) to the Constitution in 1972. Twenty-two of the necessary 38 states ratified with no difficulty, but the conservative faction in the country saw it as a threat to the traditional role of wife and mother and successfully fought back and defeated it.

The 1980s were a difficult period for Democrats. I remember helping to mount the Democratic convention in 1984 and standing on the podium that last night looking at a sea of waving American flags, excited that the first woman had been nominated for Vice President, inspired by Mario Cuomo's speech about the "two cities on a hill" and all I could think about was my dog. I didn't believe in any of it anymore. Reagan had done a great job of making the word liberal sound like a dirty word. Few Democrats had passion back then- we were so splintered and couldn't get along which lead to the creation of Democratic Leadership Forum and the eventual rise of Bill Clinton in 1992.

Hillary is the embodiment of the changes that have been bubbling up since 1963. She is a woman embracing the need to include everyone at the table. But, she is falling into a trap that started in the 80s -- demonizing her opponent. That happened back in the 80s to raise funds. Direct mail campaigns for Dems, Republicans, and special interests groups had to demonize their opponents to fan the flames of fear to survive.

What Bernie Sanders represents is someone who doesn't seem to be caught in that demonizing cycle. There has to be a way for Hillary to rise above it, too, with humor, compassion and empathy. She needs new tactics, a new strategy and to breakaway fro m how she handled her adversaries in the past. She most likely first developed her deep distrust of conservative operatives in her formative years working as a lawyer during the Watergate hearings. That mistrust of Nixon and his associates left a lasting scar on so many of us. But, we need to move passed it.

Stephen Hawking said something recently that might help ground a new strategy:

“The human failing I would most like to correct is aggression. It may have had survival advantage in caveman days, to get more food, territory or a partner with whom to reproduce, but now it threatens to destroy us all. We need to replace aggression with empathy, which “brings us together in a peaceful loving state.”

Hillary needs to be President of the United States to act upon Hawking’s insight and her ability to lead must start with a new kind of campaign.

Catherine

Guthrie: now to the talk of washington and the 2016 presidential race right now. it's the new book called clinton cash that raises questions about hillary clinton, her family's foundation, and its foreign donors might have influenced policy during clinton's time as secretary of state. peter schweitzer is the author and he joins us this morning. >>

Schweizer: good morning. >>

Guthrie: let's put it bluntly. are you hoping this book and the issues you raise in it torpedo her candidacy? >>

Schweizer: this is not really motivated to her candidacy. i've done two previous books that looked at corruption and looked at people in both political parties. what we have with the clintons is a unique arrangement where you have a powerful, you know, public figure who's involved with all these foreign entities. >>

Guthrie: if a person believes every word in your book, wouldn't that be disqualifying with everything you're saying. you say people donate and get favorable treatment by the state department run by hillary >>

Schweizer: certainly the evidence i clinton. think is pretty shocking and could have that implication. but really the motivation is consistent with my previous work, to look at the whole issue of corruption. >>

Guthrie: do you have any specific instance in which hillary clinton directly intervenes on behalf of donors to the clinton foundation? >>

Schweizer: it's a great question. what we have is a pattern of behavior. i was not in any of these meetings. i can't look into hillary clinton's mind. i certainly can't look at her e-mails. so the question becomes what is this pattern? an consistently shows that donors give large sums of money to the foundation where they pay bill clinton a lot for a speech. there's a policy action that's taken to the benefit of that donor. in some of those instances hillary reversing course on previous policy position. that's why my recommendation is somebody with subpoena power, with investigative capabilities should look at this behavior. >>

Guthrie: you think this is something that could be criminally investigated. >>

Schweizer: i think it should be. i don't go in with the assumption it was criminal, but i think it warrants further investigation.

Guthrie: if everything in your book were put before jurors, let's say, in a court of law and we were told to assume it is true, have you proven a quid pro quo? >>

Schweizer: well, i don't think a quid pro quo needs to be the standard. if you look at senator macdonalds, menendez, those were not quid pro quos. it's do people believe the events were connected and there was some sort of pay to play arrangement? and that's a question i can't answer but i think investigators should look into. >>

Guthrie: you started off mentioning you've done bipartisan investigations. but a lot of your critics say you are conservative and this is a right wing hit job. are you really claiming to be neutral here? >>

Schweizer: i'm not claiming to be neutral. but if you look at my work, i have gone aggressively after republicans. i did a book on insider trading by members of congress and went after several republicans.

Guthrie: you also did a book called "makers and takers" whose sub title said conservatives even hug their children more than liberals. >>

Schweizer: i say read the conclusion to the book where what i'm arguing is on the left and right there's a misuse of science research. it was a humorous title. that's the reason it was put that way. >>

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Guthrie: got to go. jeb bush is your next target. >>

Schweizer: yeah. >>

Guthrie: got a headline? >>

Schweizer: we're looking at airport deals to land deals, but we've been on that investigation about four months. the book is called "clinton cash." thank you very much.

Telfer, Giustra deny they tried to influence Russian uranium deal with donations to Clinton Foundation

Peter Koven | April 24, 2015 7:29 AM ET
http://business.financialpost.com/news/mining/telfer-giustra-deny-they-tried-to-influence-russian-uranium-deal-with-donations-to-clinton-foundation#__federated=1

Postmedia NewsFrank Giustra, left, and Ian Telfer deny suggestions that they donated to the charitable foundation of former President Bill Clinton and his family to help win U.S. approval to sell a uranium company to Russia.

A pair of Canadian mining magnates are denying suggestions that they donated to the charitable foundation of former President Bill Clinton and his family to help win U.S. approval to sell a uranium company to Russia.

Frank Giustra said the allegations have nothing to do with him, and are merely an attempt to “tear down” presidential candidate Hillary Clinton and her election campaign. Ian Telfer, meanwhile, said he committed the funds before he ever realized he would do the deal with the Russians.

The New York Times reported on the donations in an explosive article this week. The story involves a former Canadian mining company called Uranium One Inc., in which Giustra and Telfer were two of the key principals.

In 2010, Uranium One began a process to sell itself to Rosatom, a state-controlled nuclear giant in Russia. Uranium One had assets in Kazakhstan and the United States, and multiple U.S. government departments had to sign off on the deal. One of them is the State Department, which was led at the time by Hillary Clinton.

Uranium is considered a strategic resource, and it would be unthinkable today for the U.S. government to consider selling the country’s uranium reserves to Russia. But the Uranium One sale happened prior to Russia’s incursions into Ukraine last year, and Telfer said in an interview that getting it approved did not require lobbying.

“There was no lobbying,” he said.

The Times story noted that between 2009 and 2013, Telfer donated US$2.35 million to Clinton’s foundation. This coincided directly with the period in which the Rosatom gradually took control of Uranium One. Telfer was Uranium One’s chairman at the time.

In the interview, Telfer said he agreed to contribute US$3 million to the Clinton Foundation back in March 2008, shortly after Giustra and Clinton set up their sustainable growth initiative for the natural resource sector. That was before Uranium One had any negotiations with the Russians, and the donations he has made since then were part of that initial pledge, he said. He denied they had anything to do with influencing U.S. government officials around Uranium One.

“There were no plans for us (in March 2008) to ever have Rosatom as a majority shareholder of the company,” he said. “So therefore, there was never any thought of influencing anyone because there was nothing to influence.”

Giustra’s direct involvement with Uranium One ended back in 2007, when he sold his company UrAsia Energy Ltd. to Uranium One for about US$3 billion. UrAsia held the key Kazakhstan assets that formed the backbone of Uranium One, and there have been prior allegations that Giustra used his friendship with Bill Clinton to help secure those assets when the two men were in Kazakhstan together in 2005.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Giustra has subsequently contributed US$31.3 million to the Clinton Foundation and pledged US$100 million more, according to the Times.

In a statement on Thursday, Giustra said there “is not one shred of evidence” to back up claims that he tried to influence the U.S. government to approve the Uranium One sale to Rosatom. He called the Times piece a “wildly speculative, innuendo-laced article.” He also said that he sold all his Uranium One shares in 2007.

“I would note that those (shares) were sold at least 18 months before Hillary Clinton became the secretary of state. No one was speculating at that time that she would become the secretary of state,” he said.

In addition to Giustra and Telfer, the Times noted that other people with ties to Uranium One made contributions to the Clinton Foundation: Neil Woodyer, Frank Holmes, Paul Reynolds (who recently died in a triathalon incident) and GMP Securities Ltd.

Roll Call: Rep. Paul Ryan: 'Stimulus' Not the Way To Reboot the Economy

December 8, 2008, 12:00 a.m.
By Rep. Paul Ryan
Special to Roll Call

In weighing further measures to bolster the U.S. economy, Congress must recognize that real, sustained growth comes from the work, savings and investment of American families and businesses — not from the federal government.

We can, and should, take immediate action to address a weak economy with initiatives that produce lasting economic gains. What we cannot do is borrow and spend our way into prosperity, building up huge federal deficits and calling it "stimulus."

The intent of a second so-called stimulus — as advertised by the Democratic majority and President-elect Barack Obama — is "to get the economy back on track." But there is no evidence another huge infusion of federal dollars will stimulate anything more than a temporary jolt in consumer spending, after which the economy returns to its previous course.

The only lasting gains of stimulus spending will likely be in higher deficits and debt — both of which are soaring. In fact, after three straight years of declines, the deficit this past year more than doubled, to $455 billion. If the Democratic Congress passes its additional spending package — reported to have ballooned to between $500 billion and $750 billion — the deficit will likely blow right through the $1 trillion mark this year — the largest ever in nominal terms, and the largest as a share of the economy since World War II.

So while the long-run costs of stimulus spending packages are real, the long-run benefits are, at best, highly suspect. The reasons these temporary fiscal spending packages fail to fix the economy are many. Key among them: They do nothing to address the core problems of our current financial crisis and economic weakness; they do nothing to change the main factors driving our long-term growth trajectory; and they do nothing to promote real growth.

For the most recent example of stimulus failure, we can look to the results of the tax "rebates" enacted earlier this year. Instead of spending the extra cash, as proponents had hoped, most recipients simply paid off bills or saved the money. The stimulus boosted consumer spending by less than $20 billion but added nearly $80 billion to the national debt.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

For the most haunting example of stimulus failure, we can look to Japan's "lost decade" of the 1990s. With its economy in a sharp slowdown, the Japanese government pursued an aggressive round of fiscal stimulus packages after 1993. The spending, mostly concentrated on infrastructure, eventually pushed Japan's budget deficit to nearly 10 percent of gross domestic product by 1999, while total government debt increased to 130 percent of gross domestic product. Looking back on that decade, the Economist magazine concluded: "Japan's policymakers ... appear to have followed the Keynesian textbook ... yet, the economy is still flat on its back."

In short, the folly of relying on stimulus to correct a weak economy is the belief that the federal government can generate real, sustained growth and job creation. Of course, it cannot. Government doesn't create new jobs and prosperity — only real investment in the private sector, and expansion of U.S. economic activity, do. Put simply, because every dollar Congress spends must first be taken from the economy, Congressional spending can't grow the economic pie — it just redistributes the slices.

There are legitimate steps Congress can take to help the American economy in both the near and long term. These include the following:

● Provide Help to Those Who Need It. With the economy still shedding jobs, it makes sense to extend unemployment benefits, as we have already done.

● Support Real Policies for Growth. Fast-acting tax policy — such as allowing expensing on all new investments — would boost incentives to expand business operations and create jobs. In addition, lowering the corporate income tax rate — currently the second highest in the industrialized world — would help attract investment in the U.S., and reduce the incentives to shift business operations, and jobs, overseas.

● Provide Tax Certainty. In its most recent budget, the Democratic majority assumed the largest tax increase in history by letting a scheduled tax increase in 2010 occur, which would increase taxes on investment, savings, businesses, families and workers. This threat is stifling business investment and job creation today because of the uncertainty in tax laws. Congress should permanently extend the current tax laws and drop tax increases. This would serve as a de facto tax cut, increasing the after-tax rate of return on investment and unlocking billions in private, idle capital.

● Help Stabilize Financial Markets. Existing Securities and Exchange Commission regulations, or the lack thereof, are aggravating the sharp declines in asset values and the confidence in markets. Current mark-to-market accounting rules, last year's repeal of the uptick rule, and the opaque nature of the credit default swaps market, when combined, are aggravating the distress in our financial markets and our economy.

The federal government can help stabilize these markets by reforming the mark-to-market accounting rule to require a rolling average, restoring the uptick rule to put a brake on short selling of stocks to manipulate stock prices, and providing greater transparency in the CDS market.

● Stop Over-Selling What Congress Can Do. Congress must stop pitching the false notion that we can simply spend (then tax and borrow) our way to prosperity. Last year, Washington increased federal spending by 8.3 percent — more than twice the growth of our economy or Americans' wages; this included 11,000 pork-barrel earmarks at a cost to taxpayers of $17 billion. If — as Washington likes to suggest — higher government spending leads to stronger economic growth, our economy today would be the strongest in our nation's history.

● Get Spending Under Control and Address the Long-Term Spending Crisis. Congress must also get control of its own spending — particularly wasteful earmarks, and the unsustainable growth rate of our largest entitlement programs. Our three largest entitlements — Medicare, Medicaid and Social Security — have a current unfunded liability of $34 trillion; and every year we fail to act, we dig ourselves another $2 trillion-$3 trillion in the hole. Without reform, these programs will not only grow themselves right into extinction — they will impose a crushing blow to our budget and economy in the process.

In short, simply shoveling ever more money out the door will do nothing to address the core problems in our economy; what it will do is add hundreds of billions of dollars to federal deficits and debt, increase U.S. borrowing costs, serve as justification for even more tax hikes — and likely lead to an even deeper, longer economic crisis in the future.

I hope Washington can come together in a bipartisan fashion to address our greatest economic and fiscal challenges by: keeping taxes low so our economy can thrive, reforming regulations that are contributing to problems in financial markets, getting our spending under control and ending the wasteful practice of earmarking, and addressing the looming entitlement crisis. Such efforts would assure financial markets in the U.S. and around the world that we are serious about promoting real growth — both today, and well into the future.

Rep. Paul Ryan (R-Wis.) is ranking member of the Budget Committee.

CQ: Obama Provides More Stimulus Plan Details

By David Clarke, CQ Staff

President-elect Barack Obama on Saturday outlined what would be a massive government investment in both the country's technological and physical infrastructure as part of an economic stimulus or recovery bill Congress plans to consider next month.

Obama said his plan for investing in roads, bridges and other parts of the country's physical infrastructure would be the "single largest new investment in our national infrastructure since the creation of the federal highway system in the 1950s." He did not say specifically how much he wants to spend.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

With news about the nation's economy continuing to be bleak, Obama and Democrats are working on an economic stimulus bill that could be considered by Congress next month and possibly signed into law shortly after the new president takes office Jan. 20. Currently, Democrats are discussing a bill that would cost about $500 billion and provide funding for states facing budget shortfalls, to social service programs for the poor and for infrastructure projects. The legislation also is expected to contain a tax element, although it has yet to be decided if that will be a one-time rebate or a long-term tax cut.

During his weekly radio and Web address Saturday, Obama focused on the infrastructure part of his plan and outlined five areas he would like to see addressed in the bill:

• Making public buildings more energy efficient.

• Funding for roads, bridges and other parts of the country's physical infrastructure.

• Repairing and modernizing schools;

• Providing broadband access to more parts of the country.

• Making sure all hospitals and doctor's offices have access to patient's electronic medical records.

"When Congress reconvenes in January, I look forward to working with them to pass a plan immediately," Obama said. "We need to act with the urgency this moment demands to save or create at least two and a half million jobs so that the nearly two million Americans who've lost them know that they have a future."

Democrats have pushed to pass a much smaller economic stimulus or recovery bill in recent months but have not been able to overcome objections from the White House and congressional Republicans. GOP leaders have argued that the programs Democrats want to fund would not jumpstart the economy in the short-term and would balloon an already large budget deficit. House Republicans in particular have urged that any stimulus plan focus primarily on tax cuts for individuals and businesses rather than new government spending.

Democrats in recent weeks have argued that their recovery plan is intended to do more than stimulate the economy over the next year and that infrastructure funding is aimed at creating more jobs over several years while building the base for future economic expansion.

As he showed Saturday, Obama has not been shy about building expectations for the Democrats' plan. Beyond his proposal for massive spending on roads and similar projects, he said his plan for funding school construction projects "will launch the most sweeping effort to modernize and upgrade school buildings that this country has ever seen."

Obama and Democrats are also pushing their recovery plan as a way to address energy issues. In calling for making public buildings more energy efficient, Obama said "our government now pays the highest energy bill in the world. We need to change that." The only examples he offered for accomplishing this task are upgrading heating systems and using energy-efficient light bulbs.

Obama said he also is proposing a major change to how medical records are kept by making "sure that every doctor's office and hospital in this country is using cutting-edge technology and electronic medical records so that we can cut red tape, prevent medical mistakes, and help save billions of dollars each year."

CongressDaily: Lawmakers Prepare $15B Auto Rescue Deal

Sunday, Dec. 7, 2008
by Christian Bourge, Darren Goode, and Bill Swindell

The House and Senate are poised to move this week a package that would take $15 billion of the $25 billion appropriated earlier this year for the domestic auto industry's retooling and energy efficiency efforts and using it for an industry bailout. But prospects remain uncertain in the Senate, where Senate Banking ranking member Richard Shelby might to try to filibuster the deal.

"I hope we will be able to have an extended debate on it," Shelby said today on "Fox News Sunday." He said he did not know whether there would be enough votes to block a deal. Sen. Jeff Sessions, R-Ala., said on CBS' "Face the Nation" that the auto companies should restructure under Chapter 11 bankruptcy, and he questioned whether the Senate has enough votes to bring the auto loan plan to a vote. "I have my doubts it would pass until we have an opportunity to really see what this is all about," he said.

But Senate Banking Chairman Christopher Dodd was more confident of the chances for Senate passage. "I think they will be [there]," Dodd said on CBS's "Face the Nation."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He added: "None of us wants to wake up on January 1 to discover we don't have an industry to save." By contrast, while Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., said a deal between congressional Democratic leaders, Senate Republican leaders and the White House would be completed by Monday, he was less confident that there would be enough overall support for the move in Congress. "That's a much more complicated question," he said.

This weekend's talks have been among only the White House and Democrats, and a Senate GOP leadership aide today was unsure where the votes are yet.

On "Meet the Press," President-elect Obama expressed his support for the bailout deal, saying Congress was "doing exactly the right thing" in putting together a bill with heavy conditions.

Meanwhile, House Democratic leadership sources said the bill would include authorization to replace the retooling funding with funds appropriated in the economic stimulus package that Democrats plan to bring up for consideration in January. "Everyone believes it's basically done," said one senior Democratic aide.

A House Democratic aide said today changes are being made to a draft plan, including prohibiting auto companies from suing states that adopt California's limits on tailpipe emissions. The Bush administration has blocked California from adopting these standards, while Obama is expected to approve them after taking office. Democrats have not decided whether to include language creating an auto czar, the aide said.

The auto czar, who would oversee the restructuring of the companies, remains one the sticking points. Dodd backs the idea, and Levin said an individual would be selected in the next two to three months who would oversee the loans and ensure that "a leaner and a greener industry that comes out of this."

While he is bullish on the plan, Dodd also suggested that General Motors Corp. and Chrysler LLC should merge and that GM CEO Richard Wagoner should step down. "I think he has to move on," Dodd said. "If you're going to really restructure this, you've got to bring in a new team to do this." GM is in the worst financial shape of the Big Three, while Chrysler "is basically gone and probably ought to be merged," he added. Obama also said today that Wagoner should go.

While lawmakers made progress on the auto rescue this weekend, it remains unclear whether the House and Senate will be taking up legislation authorizing the Treasury Department to spend the remaining $350 billion allocated for the Troubled Assets Relief Program. If the Bush administration makes the request, Democratic aides say they expect little trouble getting votes for such a measure but will have to watch the situation closely to ensure that no problems erupt.

By tapping the Department of Energy loan, lawmakers appear to avoid a fight this week over whether to access additional money from the TARP total of $700 billion. Treasury has committed all but $20 billion of the initial $350 billion provided under the law and indicated it would not seek congressional approval to tap the second half unless under an emergency. Key Democrats have said that would not agree to the approve the remaining TARP funding unless they received a commitment from Treasury that some of the funding would go to stem home foreclosures, and that the department would improve oversight of the funds, such as keeping track of how banks use the money. One lobbyist noted that a standalone auto rescue measure removes the political pitfalls that could endanger passage of the TARP funds.

In other news, top Democratic sources also confirmed today House Speaker Pelosi is contemplating taking a vote this week on holding former top Bush adviser Karl Rove in contempt of Congress. Aides said House Judiciary Chairman John Conyers has pushed for the vote for some time. Pelosi has gone back and forth on whether to hold the vote, sources say, and it remains unclear whether she would ultimately follow through on the matter.

Roll Call: Work on Bailout Continues Through Weekend

By Jennifer Bendery
Roll Call Staff

Details were starting to emerge Saturday on the package being crafted by Congress and the White House aimed at keeping the nation’s car manufacturers from sinking into bankruptcy.

Congressional leaders are planning to unveil draft legislation Monday that would provide approximately $15 billion in short-term aid to the beleaguered auto industry, with a larger bailout likely next year. News reports have indicated the package will total $15 billion, but senior aides said the figure is still in flux.

The funds are designed to prop up the car manufacturers through the end of March. House Financial Services Chairman Barney Frank (D-Mass.) and Senate Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs Chairman Chris Dodd (D-Conn.) are working through the weekend to draft the measure.

The bill will include oversight provisions to ensure that automakers use the funds as intended. Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) is also pushing for a provision that would prevent automakers from using any of the funds for pursuing lawsuits against states seeking tougher emission standards.

A senior House Democratic aide emphasized that while the general framework of the deal is in place, it is still "really uncertain" how the oversight, emission and repayment aspects will play out.

The issue of how to aid auto manufacturers appeared at a standstill until Pelosi made a major concession to the White House: on Friday, she dropped her objection to tapping into an existing loan fund for fuel-efficient vehicles.

Democrats had been pushing to draw funds from the $700 billion financial industry bailout. In giving ground, Pelosi insisted that those funds be replaced "within a matter of weeks." Democrats are hoping to replace the funds in a multibillion-dollar economic stimulus package on tap for January. The White House reiterated Saturday that no money should go to the Big Three automakers unless it is clear it will be returned.

"Taxpayers should not be asked to finance assistance for automakers without a strong likelihood that they will be paid back," White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said in a statement. Perino said the White House is having "constructive discussions" with Congress and hopes they will "continue to make progress."

CQ: Obama Says Economy Will Worsen, Promises Plan to Fix It

By Adriel Bettelheim, CQ Staff

President-elect Obama predicted the recession will worsen in the coming year, but depicted his infrastructure investment program as "equal to the task" and a linchpin to long-term economic growth.

In an interview on NBC's "Meet The Press" aired Sunday, Obama also expressed tepid support for a taxpayer-funded bailout of the U.S. auto industry, saying Detroit's Big Three made repeated strategic mistakes. But, he added, the companies remain a backbone of U.S. manufacturing. "I don't think it's an option to simply allow it to collapse," he said.

Obama also addressed tax policy, international terrorism and U.S. relations with Iran and Russia in an interview with moderator Tom Brokaw. And he criticized the Bush administration for not moving faster to help homeowners facing foreclosure as part of its response to the financial crisis.

Obama acknowledged that the economic outlook has worsened since he won the presidential election and expressed concern about the fragility of the global economic system that he said is amplifying structural problems in the U.S. economy.

"This is a big problem. It's going to get worse," Obama warned early in the interview.

But he said a massive infrastructure investment plan he unveiled on Saturday would both provide a short-term economic stimulus and ensure long-term growth, through such means as making schools more energy efficient and introducing new information technologies to the health care system. Obama said his economic team is still evaluating the size and scope of the plan.

"We can get a lot of work done fast," Obama said. "All of those things are not only part of an immediate stimulus package . . . but a down payment on sustainable long-term growth."

He pointedly warned Congress not to inject politics into spending decisions, adding there were "shovel-ready" projects that could almost immediately create jobs and deliver more bang for the buck.

"The days of just pork coming out of Congress as a strategy, those days are over," he said.

On the auto bailout, Obama said his economic team was evaluating forms of aid that could be extended to General Motors Corp., Ford Motor Co. and Chrysler LLC after he takes office.

He expressed hope that Congress and the Bush administration would find a way to exert pressure on executives to make necessary changes while keeping factory doors open. And Obama criticized the companies for taking a "head-in-the-sand" approach and showing an unwillingness to make tough decisions by, for example, retooling their product lines and making smaller, more fuel-efficient vehicles.

Obama again touched on this theme later in the day, at a news conference to announce his nomination of retired Army Gen. Eric K. Shinseki to be secretary of veterans affairs.

Responding to a question about a standoff at a shuttered Chicago factory, Obama expressed support for approximately 200 workers who have been occupying the closed Republic Windows & Doors plant demanding to be paid severance and vacation pay. The family-owned firm closed after Bank of America cancelled its line of credit. The union representing the workers claims the bank – which has received money from the federal bailout of the financial system – refused to allow the company to pay the workers.

"I think they're absolutely right," Obama said, when asked about the workers' actions. "These people need to follow through on their commitments."

"Part of what I'm hoping to introduce as the next president is a new ethic of responsibility, where we say that, if you're laying off workers, the least you can do when you're making $25 million a year is give up some of your compensation and some of your bonuses, figure out ways in which workers maybe have to take a haircut, but they can still keep their jobs, they can still keep their health care, and they can still stay in their homes," Obama said.

On the financial crisis, Obama expressed disappointment that Bush administration had not acted more quickly on a measures that could help homeowners avert foreclosures. He said he would entertain a temporary moratorium on foreclosures and take steps to encourage banks and homeowners to renegotiate the terms of troubled loans.

"I do think that we have to put in place a set of rules of the road, some financial regulations that prevent the kind of speculation and leveraging that we saw in the future," Obama said.

Obama declined to say how he would follow through on a campaign pledge to raise taxes on the wealthiest Americans, saying his economic team was evaluating whether to seek new legislation to change tax policy and whether to allow some of President Bush's tax cuts to expire, in 2011.

He said he favored "tough but direct diplomacy" with Iran that could offer a combination of economic incentives and economic sanctions linked to the government's support for terror groups. And he called for a reevaluation of U.S.-Russia relations centered around nonproliferation of nuclear weapons and cooperation confronting global terrorism.

CQ: Hard Times Put Hill to Work

By David Baumann, CQ Staff

Many people expected a quiet year on Capitol Hill in 2008.

With a high-stakes presidential election coming up in November, nobody wanted to take a chance on doing anything dramatic. Democrats could not risk the majority they won just two years ago. Republicans did not want to give the Democrats any large victories upon which to campaign.

And even if President Bush wanted to boost his legacy by pushing Congress on some major issue, he lacked the political capital to pull it off. Democrats even punted domestic spending decisions until next year, rather than risk a political showdown with Bush like the one they had in 2007.

"Everybody was trying not to make a mistake that would affect the election," said former Rep. Charles W. Stenholm, D-Texas, who served 26 years in the House before being defeated in 2004.

But as the year progressed, economic news overtook the upcoming election in terms of what was important to lawmakers and to their constituents back home. The housing market, a significant base for consumer spending — the bedrock of the economy — had stalled out, and the number of foreclosures on homes rose. Job losses were reported every month, and the number of Americans seeking unemployment benefits climbed to recent highs. Meanwhile, inflation started to grow, led for the most part by record high prices for gasoline, which surpassed $4 a gallon on a national average over the summer.

Lawmakers were forced to act, and, in some cases, make decisions that could come back to haunt them on Election Day. Republicans who usually favor keeping the government and private commerce separate agreed to a federal takeover of mortgage giants Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac and a multibillion-dollar bailout of the financial industry. Democrats reversed a long held stance and agreed to end a ban on drilling for oil and gas off the intercontinental shelf.

This election year, Congress "was crisis-driven," said John Feehery, who was press secretary for former House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, R-Ill.

Efforts to Stimulate the Economy

The week before the president's State of the Union address in January, House leaders and the White House agreed on a stimulus package intended to jump-start the economy. While such legislation often can take months to complete, lawmakers took just two weeks to clear a $151.7 billion bill that provided tax rebate checks to individuals and families and investment incentives to businesses (PL 110-185).

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Work also continued on a mortgage relief bill to help improve the housing market, which had been severely hurt by a collapse in the market for subprime mortgages. The House had passed a bill in 2007, and the Senate began its effort in earnest in the spring of this year. At the core of the bill was a $300 billion trust fund for the Federal Housing Administration to help borrowers refinance loans they could not afford, and the two chambers volleyed it back and forth over the next few months as they worked to alleviate the concerns of specific members and of the president.

The bill took on an unexpected urgency in July, when Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr. announced that the government needed immediate authority to protect Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac from collapsing. Paulson wanted approval from Congress for the Treasury to buy assets from the companies, including their mortgage holdings and shares of their stock, and extend new credit to them.

Lawmakers agreed and passed the bill (PL 110-289) in late July. Conservatives griped about the bill's cost and the government's new authority to bail out the enterprises, which owned or guaranteed about half of all U.S. mortgages. "I don't like everything in this bill, either," House Financial Services Chairman Barney Frank, D-Mass., said in response to criticism. "It is inconceivable to me that anybody would like everything in this bill — it is a product of a very significant set of compromises."

Coming just months before the election, the vote became ammunition in congressional campaigns. Supporters of the mortgage relief plan, such as Connecticut Republican Rep. Christopher Shays, touted his vote to help his district's homeowners avoid foreclosure. In South Carolina, Democrat Jane Dyer criticized Republican incumbent Rep. J. Gresham Barrett's "no" vote on the housing bill. And in South Dakota, Republican Joel Dykstra blamed Democratic incumbent Sen. Tim Johnson, a member of the Senate Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs Committee, for allowing the panel to ignore oversight of financial institutions.

Fears over the possibility of banks collapsing and credit drying up raised the stakes even higher in the fall, just as Congress was preparing to recess for the last month of campaigning. Armed with warnings that the economy was heading into the worst downturn since the Great Depression, Paulson and the administration pleaded with congressional leaders to allow a government bailout of the financial services industry.

The plan would give the Treasury secretary the authority to use as much as $700 billion to buy up troubled mortgage-related securities in an attempt to unclog credit markets and improve the balance sheets of banks and other financial institutions teetering on collapse. It would open the door to unprecedented federal intervention to shore up private entities.

Congressional leaders, shaken by Paulson's dire description of the state of the economy, went along with the Troubled Asset Relief Program (TARP). But they underestimated constituent anger over what was viewed as a bailout of wealthy financial giants, and a bipartisan coalition in the House defeated it on the floor in a vote that stunned markets globally.

The Senate took over and combined a slightly sweetened bailout package with a multipurpose measure to renew a variety of expiring tax breaks, add a one-year "patch" on the alternative minimum tax, and require insurance companies to offer benefits for treating mental illness and addiction on par with those provided for other health issues.

The Senate passed the new legislation. The House cleared it, with some reluctance still from many members, and the president signed it immediately.

Coming so close to the election, this bailout quickly became a campaign issue. For instance, in Kentucky, Democratic challenger Bruce Lunsford tried to tie Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell to the failing financial giants.

The vote had other political repercussions as well. Rep. John Campbell, R-Calif., said he believed he had to vote for the bailout legislation. However, Campbell had been vying for the chairmanship of the conservative Republican Study Committee (RSC), many of whose members had opposed the measure. Campbell dropped his candidacy for the RSC chair after the vote.

After the election, Democrats talked about trying to move another stimulus bill — this one focused on spending for job-creating projects such as infrastructure improvements. But Republican lawmakers and Bush had little interest in such a bill, so Democrats decided to wait until they had control of the White House and larger majorities in January to work on new legislation to address the economy.

And, late in the year, the heads of the Big Three automakers went to Washington twice — first by corporate jet and then again by the more humble means of driving their own products — to plead for federal assistance. Lawmakers, reacting to polls showing Americans leaned away from another bailout of the private sector, acknowledged there was a crisis in the auto industry but were reluctant to dole out more federal funds. Democrats said the administration should use funds from the financial services bailout to shore up the car industry, and the president said lawmakers should repurpose an existing $25 billion Energy Department loan program that was intended to help automakers retool to produce more fuel-efficient cars.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Democratic leaders and President-elect Barack Obama said a broad stimulus bill will be their priority when the 111th Congress convenes in January, so lawmakers plan to have a measure ready for the new president to sign immediately after his inauguration Jan. 20.

The economic crisis overshadowed all others in the closing months of the presidential campaign, with Democrat Obama and Republican John McCain trading charges about which party was responsible. “In the end, the economy worked to a great degree to the Democrats’ favor,” Stenholm said, adding that Republicans had controlled the White House for the past eight years. “You get credit for the things that go right and blame for the things that go wrong.”

GOP Wins on Energy

In dealing with the related issue of energy costs, Republicans were able to take advantage of rising gasoline prices to force Democrats’ hands on a longtime debate: whether the United States should be able to drill for oil and gas off the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. As the cost at the pump climbed, public opinion polls shifted in favor of lifting a 26-year-old moratorium on offshore drilling.

In the Senate, Republicans stalled non-energy legislation, and House Democrats abandoned attempts to take annual spending bills to the floor, fearing GOP drilling amendments. Republicans even held informal sessions on the House floor during the August recess to focus attention on the issue.

By the time lawmakers returned from recess and the two parties’ nominating conventions, Democrats knew they had lost any leverage in this fight. They tried to negotiate a compromise, but Republicans held tight and forced them to allow the offshore drilling moratorium — typically in the annual appropriations bill for the Interior Department — to expire by not including it in a stopgap spending measure (PL 110-329) to continue funding domestic programs into the new year.

The stopgap measure was needed because Democrats decided early in the year that it would be useless to try to negotiate with Bush over the annual appropriations measures. In 2007, Bush refused to yield on spending issues and carried through on threats to veto appropriations bills. Ultimately, Democrats were forced to give in to him on many of their major spending priorities.

Some Longtime Goals Accomplished

Democrats did succeed in clearing several reauthorization measures, some of which Republicans had not passed for several years.

Congress cleared Amtrak reauthorization legislation (PL 110-432) for the first time since 1997, after supporters of intercity rail agreed to allow private companies to bid on the development and construction of a high-speed rail line in the northeast corridor. The House and Senate sent legislation to the president reauthorizing the Higher Education Act (PL 110-315). The bill, the first reauthorization of higher education programs in a decade, tightens ethics requirements and increases the maximum authorized Pell grant.

Congress also succeeded in overriding two Bush vetoes. In May, lawmakers voted to override the president on a $289 billion, five-year farm bill (PL 110-246). The measure, which cleared after Congress passed six short-term extensions, maintains the crop subsidy program and boosts funding for nutrition programs. And, in July, after a series of votes that included the dramatic return of Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., to the Hill for the first time since surgery for a brain tumor, Congress voted to enact, over Bush’s objections, legislation that blocked a scheduled cut in pay rates for physicians who participate in the Medicare health care program for the elderly and disabled.

Several issues, such as climate change, wage discrimination and tobacco regulation, were debated but never settled. Many of those are expected to come up again in the 111th Congress, when Democrats hope that their wider majorities in the House and Senate and a member of their own party in the White House will make bills addressing those issues easier to clear.

“The debate that took place in the current Congress shaped the policies that are likely to evolve in the next Congress,” said Scott Lilly, a senior fellow at the liberal Center for American Progress and former Democratic staff director of the House Appropriations Committee.

Boehner: You Haven't Seen Nothin' Yet When It Comes to Failed Conservative Governance

In Explosive New Interview, the Republican House Leader Lays Out Blueprint of Misguided Priorities His Party Would Pursue If Returned to Power – Everything From Raising the Retirement Age, to Pushing Young Adults Off Their Parents' Insurance, to Taking Away Rx Drug Relief from Seniors, to Giving Big Oil a Free Pass

And Did Boehner Actually Say the Problems on Wall Street That Collapsed the Economy Are No Bigger Than an "Ant"? Yes, yes he did.

See GOP Leader's Must Read Interview With the Pittsburgh Tribune-Review Below ***

Buckle up, America, because Republican House Leader John Boehner promises it's going to be a bumpy ride if his party is back in the driver's seat. After green-lighting 8 years of failed conservative policies in the Bush era that drove the economy deep into the ditch, Boehner insists we haven't seen anything yet. From health care to Wall Street reform, the GOP leader intends to slam the breaks on any and all progress that has been made under this administration to pull the economy from the brink of depression. Not stopping there, Boehner hopes to unravel progress made as far back as 70 years by scaling back Social Security.

Wall Street: in the GOP Leader's view, the culture of greed and recklessness on Wall Street that left 8 million Americans without jobs and evaporated $17 trillion in retirement savings and net worth, is a problem no bigger than the size of an "ant." It's a blunt acknowledgment of the ant-sized appreciation Republican leaders have for the pain and suffering working Americans are still feeling in the wake of the meltdown on Wall Street. But they no doubt have an elephant-sized appreciation for the amount of contributions pouring in from Wall Street lobbyists and CEO's these days.

Social Security: in the same breathe the GOP Leader called the Democrat's efforts to reform Wall Street a "nuclear weapon," he promises to launch a nuclear bomb of his own on Social Security by slashing benefits, raising the retirement age, and for the first time ever, conducting means testing on seniors. Such an assault on the safety net that has kept generations of seniors from poverty would make even George W. Bush blush.

Health Care: the GOP Leader says Americans shouldn't get used to any of the welcome reforms under the new health care law, including the new ban on lifetime insurance caps, filling in the infamous 'donut hole' prescription drug coverage gap for seniors, allowing young adults under 26 to stay on their parents' insurance plans, the new tax credits making health care more affordable for small businesses, and the sweeping new consumer protections from the worst insurance industry practices like dropping people when they get sick or denying coverage to those with "pre-existing conditions."

Offshore drilling: the GOP leader thinks big oil hasn't polluted our coastline enough, and if he had his way, big oil would have a free pass to drill wherever they pleased. 'Drill, baby, drill' isn't just a slogan for Leader Boehner, it's a centerpiece in his Party's blueprint of failed, conservative priorities.

Obama's good for GOP, Boehner says

By The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review staff | Tuesday, June 29, 2010 | http://www.bostonherald.com | U.S. Politics

House Minority Leader John Boehner, the Ohio Republican with his eye on Speaker Nancy Pelosi's gavel, said the tide is turning the GOP's way.

"The American people have written off the Democrats," Boehner said Monday in an interview with Tribune-Review editors and reporters. "They're willing to look at us again."

Boehner stopped short of predicting Republicans would gain the 39 seats they need to retake control of Congress, but he said a backlash against President Obama's policies has energized Republican voters more than Democrats. Boehner said voters are angry at a government they believe is overreaching and indifferent.

University of Virginia political scientist Isaac Wood said excitement among tea party protesters might not carry over to the electorate as a whole.

"While the enthusiasm of tea party types may drive them to the polls and boost Republicans, it does not yet seem that huge waves of new voters will be flocking to the polls," Wood said.

Boehner said the protests are emblematic of deep voter anger against Washington's leaders.

"They're snuffing out the America that I grew up in," Boehner said. "Right now, we've got more Americans engaged in their government than at any time in our history. There's a political rebellion brewing, and I don't think we've seen anything like it since 1776."

The health care law passed in March "pushed most Americans over the edge," Boehner said.

If Republicans retake control of the House, Boehner promised a vote on a bill repealing the health care law and replacing it with a scaled-down package of tax breaks and court reforms. Democrats likely would maintain control of the Senate, and Obama could veto the proposal, all but eliminating its chances of succeeding.

"We are going to do everything we can to make sure that this law and this program never really takes effect," Boehner said. One option would be to repeal the $534 billion in Medicare cuts, which pay for more than half of the law's provisions. "They're going to need money from the Congress to hire these 20,000-plus bureaucrats they need to hire to make this program work. They're not going to get one dime from us."

Boehner criticized the financial regulatory overhaul compromise reached last week between House and Senate negotiators as an overreaction to the financial crisis that triggered the recession. The bill would tighten restrictions on lending, create a consumer protection agency with broad oversight power and give the government an orderly way to dissolve the largest financial institutions if they run out of money.

"This is killing an ant with a nuclear weapon," Boehner said. What's most needed is more transparency and better enforcement by regulators, he said.

Allan H. Meltzer, a political economy professor at Carnegie Mellon University, said the financial bill "does nothing to restore integrity to the mortgage market by correcting Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, and the bill does not eliminate 'too big to fail.' "

Boehner said Obama overreacted to the BP oil spill in the Gulf of Mexico. The spill might warrant a "pause" in deepwater drilling, but Obama's blanket ban on drilling in the gulf -- which a judge overturned last week -- could devastate the region's economy, he said. Louisiana State University scientists estimate the ban could have affected more than 10,000 jobs.

Boehner had praise, however, for Obama's troop surge in Afghanistan and stepped-up drone attacks in Pakistan. He declined to list any benchmarks he has for measuring progress in the nine-year war, at a time of increasing violence and Obama's replacement of Gen. Stanley McChrystal with Gen. David Petraeus.

Ensuring there's enough money to pay for the war will require reforming the country's entitlement system, Boehner said. He said he'd favor increasing the Social Security retirement age to 70 for people who have at least 20 years until retirement, tying cost-of-living increases to the consumer price index rather than wage inflation and limiting payments to those who need them.

"We need to look at the American people and explain to them that we're broke," Boehner said. "If you have substantial non-Social Security income while you're retired, why are we paying you at a time when we're broke? We just need to be honest with people."

International Human Rights Day marks the anniversary of the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights on Dec. 10, 1948. Crafted in the shadow of the horrors of the Holocaust and World War II, the declaration gave the world vision it needed to stand up to fear, and the blueprint it craved to build a safer and more just world.

It is a bold document, based on a single premise – that the "recognition of the inherent dignity and of the equal and inalienable rights of all members of the human family is the foundation of freedom, justice and peace in the world."

Hyde Park's Eleanor Roosevelt, who led the drafting and adoption of the declaration, understood we are all members of the human family, and that for governments to prosper and wars to cease, we must treat each other with the same respect and candor that we treat our own families. She knew this would not be easy or popular and that she would be accused of championing ideals that could never be achieved. But she persisted; she knew that without ideals, politics and policy are merely power games without a soul.

She urged America and the world to recognize that human rights "begin in small places, close to home…the places where every man, woman and child seeks equal justice, equal opportunity, equal dignity without discrimination." And that "unless these rights have meaning there, they have little meaning anywhere."

But she also knew that rights come with responsibilities. For rights to exist here and around the world, we must recognize, implement and defend them. As she often argued: "Without concerned citizen action to uphold them close to home, we shall look in vain for progress in the larger world."

Eleanor Roosevelt dedicated her life to promoting this vision. It is not simple work. As Hillary Clinton explained in Hard Choices, "Our challenge is to be clear-eyed about the world as it is while never losing sight of the world as we want it to be."

We can do better. That's what human rights mean.

It is hard, tiring work. It takes the courage to dream, the political skills necessary to implement the dream, and a heart fierce enough to continue the struggle.

Let us recommit to the rights of all members of the human family. Let us hear Eleanor's call.

Wall Street Journal: "Little Crossover Appeal for Hillary Clinton, Jeb Bush — WSJ/NBC Poll"

By Patrick O'Connor

December 22, 2014, 7:23 a.m. EST

It's hard to find people open to supporting both Hillary Clinton and Jeb Bush.

Despite claims the two potential White House hopefuls would bring some crossover appeal to the next presidential race in 2016, only 8% of American adults say they would be open to both, according to the results of the latest Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll. One in five people surveyed said they couldn't support either.

That's not terribly surprising for America's two reigning political dynasties. Both families engender as much anger from opponents as they do enthusiasm from supporters. But it suggests a contest between the two would break along predictably partisan lines.

Neither Mrs. Clinton nor Mr. Bush is a lock to run, but, at this early stage in the posturing, the poll results look much better for the former secretary of state. Half of all American adults said they would be open to supporting Mrs. Clinton, while 48% said they couldn't.

Mr. Bush, the former Florida governor, would start the race with 57% of adults saying they wouldn't be open to voting for him for president. Just 31% said they would. Unlike Mrs. Clinton, who scores well among Democrats, a third of all Republicans said they wouldn't vote for Mr. Bush.

One trend starting to emerge: Mrs. Clinton appeals to many of the same groups as President Barack Obama, with some notable exceptions. Hart Research Associates, the Democratic polling firm that conducts the Journal survey with the Republican firm Public Opinion Strategies, compared Mrs. Clinton's support among 21 demographic groups with Mr. Obama's support in 2012.

The numbers showed nearly identical, dismal levels of support for both Mrs. Clinton and the president among white men (right around 35%), but Mrs. Clinton far exceeds what the president tallied among white women, with 52% saying they would be open to support her.

Mrs. Clinton would have to make up some ground to match Mr. Obama's numbers among black and Hispanic voters. But the former secretary of state has a big edge among small-town and rural voters. Perhaps most interesting, Mrs. Clinton does much better among Latino women than she does among Latino men.

The poll also found evidence that to win the presidency, Mrs. Clinton would need to distinguish herself from the president. Some 22% of voters said they would be open to supporting Mrs. Clinton but also want to see the next president move in a different direction than the current officeholder.

Boston Globe: "Clinton faces headwinds from liberals as Warren rises"

By Jessica Meyers

December 21, 2014

It has been a tough year for the Hillary Rodham Clinton juggernaut.

Her record as secretary of state was undercut by the rise of the Islamic State and a breakdown in relations with Russia. Her much-awaited book didn't sell many copies. Her face graced the cover of this year's worst-selling issue of People magazine.

Then, during the last few weeks, a different juggernaut erupted — a liberal campaign to persuade Massachusetts Senator Elizabeth Warren to run for president.

One group, MoveOn.org, is spending $1 million on a "Run Warren Run" effort and recently sent troops to the first-caucus state of Iowa. A second team, Democracy for America, has bolted from its pro-Clinton founder and is using $250,000 on a similar pro-Warren effort.

Clinton still appears likely to clinch a nomination, particularly if Warren keeps her pledge not to run. But the difficulties of 2014 are casting her race in a different light, raising questions about liberal dissatisfaction with her record and whether a leftward shift would hurt her in a general election.

“There are a lot of unchecked boxes with Hillary Clinton when it comes to economic populism and corporate accountability,” said Adam Green, cofounder of the Progressive Change Campaign Committee, a liberal group. “There are definitely red flags.”

He cited pricey speaking fees that Clinton received at two events for Goldman Sachs, a Wall Street investment bank, and questions about her position on numerous policies that affect the middle class, such as a long-shot hope to expand Social Security benefits.

The group, while not part of the draft effort, has sent an organizer to New Hampshire in hopes of creating a coalition that ensures that candidates carry Warren’s message.

At the very least, these liberal groups hope to use her momentum to push Clinton in a direction more aligned with a populist agenda.

“We absolutely would welcome Secretary Clinton laying out an energizing and bold agenda on the issues MoveOn members care about and Senator Warren cares about,” said Ben Wikler, Washington director of MoveOn.org.

In a sign of increased agitation with the Warren dynamic, a Clinton adviser recently met with the Progressive Change Campaign Committee, said cofounder Green, confirming a report first aired by MSNBC. He declined to provide details.

Democracy for America helps showcase the divide among activists. While the liberal group is pushing for Warren, founder Howard Dean favors Clinton.

“I am convinced if you put the facts in front of Hillary Clinton, she would see the facts, she would understand the issue, and she would do the right thing,” said Dean, a former Vermont governor and past chairman of the Democratic National Committee.

Many Democrats still flock to Clinton. More than 80 percent said they would support her in a presidential bid, according to a recent NBC News/Wall Street Journal poll. But 71 percent of all voters surveyed said they want the next president to take a different approach to the White House.

Warren’s recent successes have propelled her popularity among liberals. She nearly derailed a big spending bill over a provision that she said would water down financial regulations. She has also taken on the White House by opposing Obama’s nominee for a Treasury undersecretary, Antonio Weiss, largely due to his Wall Street ties.

Supporters shrug at Warren’s insistence that she is not running in 2016 and note that she puts her dismissals in present tense. She has pledged to complete her term, which ends in January 2019. Clinton has signaled she will run but has not given a final decision.

Clinton has stayed silent on Warren’s latest maneuvers. But supporters are setting her up as a liberal figure in her own right.

“There’s such an impressive record in Hillary’s life and across the span of her career supporting and promoting opportunities for middle-class families, for women, and children,” said Tracy Sefl, a senior adviser for Ready for Hillary, a political action committee that is not affiliated with Clinton but has raised more than $12 million to encourage a presidential bid.

Nick Merrill, a spokesman for Clinton, said the two women have long fought for the same ideals.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Asked about the impact of Warren's rise on a potential Clinton bid, he said via e-mail, "We need more people like Elizabeth Warren and those she inspires fighting for them."

Clinton channeled the Massachusetts senator in October, when she spoke at a Boston event aimed at saving Martha Coakley's faltering Massachusetts gubernatorial campaign.

"Don't let anyone tell you that, you know, it's corporations and businesses that create jobs," she said, echoing a theme often sounded by Warren. Republicans denounced her remarks as liberal pandering, and she backed away from them days later saying she had "shorthanded" her comments.

But some of the enthusiasm Clinton generated when she first ran for president in 2008 has waned.

A speech she gave at Georgetown University this month filled a little more than half the auditorium.

Her autobiography, a 656-page tome titled "Hard Choices," has yet to sell enough copies to meet a reported $14 million advance.

And people still wince at Clinton's comment last June that she and her husband left the White House "dead broke."

Some supporters fear this erosion of Clinton's image, especially when encouraged by members of her own party, will hurt Democratic chances of winning the White House.

"My concern is anytime you leave your base, you run the risk of Republicans pursuing," said Lou D'Allesandro, a longtime New Hampshire state senator and Clinton ally. "But if [Clinton] decides to run, it will be tough to unlodge her."

The pair aren't exactly chummy.

Warren called out Clinton in her book, "The Two-Income Trap," for approving bankruptcy legislation as a New York senator that Warren believed would harm working families.

But Warren has said she backs a Clinton run. And Clinton has sought to make friends. "I love watching Elizabeth give it to those who deserve to get it," she said at the Coakley event.

Liberals are banking on the Warren focus to pay off even if she doesn't run.

Clinton "isn't a turn-off as much as an insurance policy," said Mary Anne Marsh, a Democratic political analyst in Boston. "This is much more about getting Hillary Clinton to embrace these conditions than watching Elizabeth Warren on a campaign for the White House."

Politicker NJ: "Rutgers 2016 Poll of NJ voters: Clinton 49%, Christie 39%"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By Max Pizarro

December 22, 2014, 12:53 p.m. EST

In a 2016 mano-a-mano between Gov. Chris Christie and former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, New Jersey voters continue to give Clinton a double-digit lead, according to the latest Rutgers-Eagleton Poll.

Forty-nine percent of registered voters say they would support Clinton over Christie, while 39 percent back Christie. The gap between the two has remained around 10 points through much of the past year, according to polling director David Redlawsk.

Clinton is also more positively received by New Jersey voters, with a 56 percent favorability rating, compared to Christie's 44 percent. While Clinton's favorability rating is down from 65 percent at the beginning of 2014, Christie's dropped even more after January's Bridgegate revelations. Both ratings, however, have remained relatively stable since their declines early in the year.

"It probably makes sense that there is little movement in a hypothetical matchup two years before the actual election," said Redlawsk, director of the Eagleton Center for Public Interest Polling and professor of political science at Rutgers University. "Still, Christie starts down double-digits in his home state if both he and Clinton are the nominees."

Sixty-three percent of New Jersey voters expect Christie to hit the 2016 campaign trail, up six points since last asked in an August Rutgers-Eagleton Poll. Voters also think Christie's decision-making ahead of a potential presidential campaign has not been New Jersey-focused. Instead, 55 percent says the governor's choices in signing or vetoing bills have been more about a potential presidential run, rather than what's good for the state. In addition, 41 percent think Christie's travel schedule outside of the state for fundraising and campaigning has hurt his ability to govern. But 52 percent say his travels have made no difference to his ability to govern.

At this point, about seven in ten Republicans and Democrats name a preference for their party's nomination, little changed throughout 2014. Republicans and those leaning GOP continue to stick by Christie as their top choice, while Democrats (along with leaners) overwhelmingly still prefer Clinton.

Christie is number 1 for 32 percent of Garden State Republicans and GOP leaners, down nine points since August. Another nine percent name Christie as their second choice. Former 2012 GOP nominee Mitt Romney follows with 10 percent naming him as first choice and eight percent listing him second.

In contrast, 54 percent of Democrats and those leaning Democrat choose Clinton as their candidate, down five points from August. For another eight percent, she is the second choice. No other Democrat breaks 10 percent in first choice mentions; Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-MA) follows as first choice for six percent and second choice for five percent.

Results are from a statewide poll of 750 adults, contacted by live callers on both landlines and cell phones from Dec. 3-10, 2014. The subsample of 646 registered voters reported on here has a margin of error of +/-4.3 percentage points.

[Subtitle:] Hillary Clinton prepares a 2016 campaign on promises of upward mobility for the middle class

It wasn't until this fall that Hillary Clinton began to show her hand. Her book tour was winding down, the midterm elections were gearing up, and her paid speaking events, for which she charged up to $300,000 a pop, had passed from initial curiosity into the realm of postmodern performance art–spectacles, like Andy Warhol prints, remarked on mainly for their cost.

But as she embarked on the campaign trail for Democratic candidates, speaking gratis to voters, she dropped the milquetoast observations about American foreign policy and focused instead on a single, overarching message: the economic frustration of the American middle class.

"Working people haven't gotten a raise in a decade, and it feels harder and harder to get ahead," she said in Pennsylvania, in what had become a typical stump speech. From California to Massachusetts, she told voters to choose politicians who were "on your side," to demand a "fair shot" and a "fresh start," to make their vote about "upward mobility." By the time she got to New York, she was practically preaching. "If you work hard and do your part, you and your family are supposed to be able to have a better life," she roared.

If that rhetoric sounds familiar, that's because it is. Barack Obama made "on your side" and "fair shot" the two dominant clichés of the 2012 election. They, in turn, owed a lot to Clinton's husband, the 42nd President, who made the "working hard and playing by the rules" trope a huge crowd pleaser in the 1990s. Indeed, the most remarkable part of Clinton's new message was that it wasn't new at all. The most talked-about presidential candidate who is not yet a candidate had simply seized at last upon the issue that has dominated every election in the past generation–and campaign professionals across the country took note.

It is, after all, good politics. Despite the recent growth of the economy, the drop in oil prices and some qualified optimism about wages, the vast majority of Americans have yet to feel so much as a gentle breeze of economic recovery. The median American income this year was about 6% lower than it was in 2000, if adjusted for inflation, and two-thirds of Americans are now living on paychecks that are 15% to 35% smaller than they were in 2002, according to Robert Shapiro, a former economic adviser to President Bill Clinton and co-founder of Sonecon, an economic advisory and analysis firm. "Most people are getting poorer every year," says Shapiro. "There's nothing like this on record. It explains our current politics in a way that no other data explain it."

But if delivering a couple dozen speeches about the broken economy isn't political rocket science, figuring out a way to convince voters that you're the one to fix it just might be. Clinton, who is expected to announce her candidacy in early 2015, has her work cut out for her. If she's going to run on a message of economic prosperity for the middle class, she will need a persuasive policy agenda and a rock-solid political strategy to convince voters that she is, or could be, the new hero of the middle class.

American voters have been promised the moon before, and 2016 will be no different. In the next few months, all the Republican presidential hopefuls will present their lists of policy fixes, including old standbys like more domestic energy, less regulation and lower taxes. Obama, for his part, will continue to push his agenda, including a higher minimum wage and an expanded Earned Income Tax Credit, a tax refund designed to reward working families.

Clinton, who will want to differentiate herself from Obama, will probably lift a handful of policies from the tried-and-true Democratic handbook, like funding more infrastructure projects, while loudly championing a few particularly innovative ideas of her own. William Galston, a fellow at the Brookings Institution and a former domestic-policy adviser to Clinton's husband, suggests, for example, creating an online public university–the National Online University, he calls it–where anyone could get a degree, in their own time, for free. Others propose federally backed computer-manufacturing apprenticeships, free IT classes and streamlined regulations to make it easier to start small businesses. But while some voters are moved by policy ideas, Clinton's success in both the primaries and a general election will hinge on whether she is able to give a good sermon about something more important: hope.

Cue hometown boy Bill Clinton. In mid-November, he offered a 2016 campaign preview of his own in a speech at his presidential library in Little Rock, Ark. "When I took office, the distribution of American prosperity looked astonishingly like it does now," he told a group of supporters. But by the end of the decade, "we had three surpluses and the fourth surplus we submitted to Congress when I left." The Clinton Administration, he said, created 50% more jobs than Reagan's, moved 100 times as many people up from poverty and increased the incomes of the bottom 20% of Americans by 23.6%. “This shows the importance of policy,” he said. Then he added pointedly, “We can do this again.” The subtext was clear to everyone present: all we need to return to past glory is a bit of that Clinton touch.

That is, of course, a story line that rankles Clinton’s rivals, both on the Republican side and among the contingent of liberal Democrats who would prefer to see a populist candidate like Elizabeth Warren snag the nomination. Both groups take issue with the narrative. The boom in the ’90s, they believe, was not the result of presidential policy so much as good timing: the birth of the commercial Internet drove productivity and wages higher at a time when the U.S.’s slowly declining manufacturing sector had yet to hit rock bottom. But from there, the two sides’ strategies diverge.

Republicans point out that voters’ memories of the Clinton Administration are hardly all roses. “It’s amusing that the Clinton allies rely heavily on spinning any positives they can from the 1990s while avoiding the baggage that her campaign will carry from their past scandals,” said Tim Miller, who runs the conservative PAC America Rising.

Liberal Democrats are already busy discrediting the idea that Clinton, who is more closely associated with Wall Street than factory floors, should be cast as a warrior for the little guy at all. They point out that in their quarter-century in the public spotlight, the Clintons have raised more than a billion dollars from corporations and business elites, and that nearly all the biggest financial firms have already, albeit tacitly, pledged Clinton their support. Forty-four percent of all voters in Iowa thought Clinton’s “close ties to Wall Street” were a disadvantage, according to an October poll.

Clinton and her close circle are not oblivious to the problem. Aides patiently explain that Clinton donates her famously large speaking fees to her family’s foundation and that the differences between her views and those of the populist wing of the party “are more rhetorical than actual.” But the debate foreshadows the fight to come–when Clinton hopes to reclaim the spirit of the struggling middle class and that same group of voters goes shopping for a candidate who can actually make a difference.

CNN: “These 2016 long-shots think they can win?”

By Stephen Collinson

December 22, 2014, 9:31 a.m. EST

No one knows your name so here's an idea: why not run for President?

Politicians who would draw blank stares from most Americans are toying -- sometimes openly -- with the idea of a run, gunning for a chance to take on the biggest names in politics and to defy the odds and end up in the White House.

On the Republican side, this crew of long-shots includes former New York Gov. George Pataki, businesswoman Carly Fiorina, 2012 candidate Rick Santorum and Indiana Gov. Mike Pence. Former Virginia Sen. Jim Webb, outgoing Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley and Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders could vie for the Democratic nomination.

None of these potential 2016ers register more than single digits in most polls and they'd face seemingly insurmountable odds against politicians who are so well known that they essentially double as national celebrities. Hillary Clinton is the overwhelming favorite for Democrats, though she continues to eye Elizabeth Warren -- a huge political brand in her own right. Meanwhile, Jeb Bush, Ted Cruz, Rand Paul, Marco Rubio and Chris Christie could bring so much star power to a GOP primary fight that lesser-known candidates might struggle to get a word in.

So why would largely unknown candidates endure the endless stump speeches, germ-laden hand shakes, pleas to donors, soggy pizza, late night flights and crack-of-dawn TV hits that come with running for President?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"It's ego," said David Johnson, a Georgia political consultant who runs a Republican-leaning firm. "It's a way to build their brand identity. They get a platform during the debates, they are able to advocate their positions."

Every presidential campaign is by definition a long-shot — after all, only one candidate can win. A victorious White House bid is a mystical blend of tactics and timing, luck and charisma and the ability to ride out a crisis.

But not everyone who loses is a loser. A presidential bid is also a pretty good line on a resume -- even if it doesn't lead to the Oval Office.

"For some of these candidates, it's pretty obvious that they are thinking long term about their careers — and thinking about building a brand for themselves that they can parlay into a political talk show," said Oberlin College Professor Michael Parkin, author of an academic paper on how political candidates use late night television.

Mike Huckabee's folksy charm won over voters at the Iowa caucus in 2008 and he ended up with a radio show. He is still strong among evangelicals and could jump into the 2016 race if he sees an opening.

A losing race can still turn a politician into a bigger player in their party, fatten lecture fees or lead to new jobs in government.

Howard Dean, for instance, turned his infamous flame out during the 2004 Democratic primary into a job as chairman of the Democratic National Committee, which helped him influence the party's direction long after his loss.

Another Democrat, Dennis Kucinich, was one of a crowd of 435 in the House of Representatives. But in presidential runs mostly remembered for his claim he saw a UFO and arm twirling antics to show he had no corporate "strings," Kucinich won national attention for his brand of liberal politics.

Former Speaker Newt Gingrich introduced himself to a new generation of American conservatives with his 2012 presidential run. He's now a sought after pundit, including on CNN, and an author.

The power of presidential campaigns to make someone's name is already playing out in 2016. Neurosurgeon Ben Carson polled second in an early CNN snapshot of the Republican race this month, despite being barely known outside of conservative circles.

"If you run for the American presidency and don't make it, but run a credible effort, you have enhanced your stature on the national stage," said David Yepsen, a connoisseur of political long-shots after 34 years with the Des Moines Register. "Politics is a game run by risk takers and most of them fail. But enough of them succeed. You wind up in a better place."

In 2007, Jim Gilmore, a former Virginia governor and Republican Party chief, figured he was qualified to be president and was a big enough name to have a chance. He had a set of economic and foreign policy issues he cared about, so he launched a campaign.

He sparred with candidates like Mitt Romney, John McCain and Rudy Giuliani in the early debates but quit the race months before the first nominating contests when he failed to catch fire. He has no regrets.

"For me, it still remains a positive experience. I was happy that I ran," said Gilmore, who used his campaign to pivot into a Senate race, which he lost. "It's important to offer the right kinds of thinking of policy and programs for the people of the United States — that's what comes through in a presidential campaign."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Gilmore now runs American Opportunity, a conservative policy organization.

Candidates set out for the White House hoping that lightning might strike. After all, it has before.

No one thought Jimmy Carter had a shot in 1976. But he spent months going door-to-door in Iowa and built a campaign that took him to the presidency. Few pundits gave Barack Obama, the self styled "skinny kid with a funny name," a chance of downing the Clinton machine in 2008. But he's now the 44th president.

In 1991, President George H.W. Bush was riding high in the polls after winning the Gulf War and the Democratic nomination didn't seem worth a dime. But a talented governor from Arkansas, seen as a long-shot because of his truckload of personal baggage, jumped into the race when other big name Democrats passed. Soon, he was President Bill Clinton.

A long-odds White House bid is also a chance for a politician to make themselves competitive for the vice presidency.

Joe Biden didn't even win 1% in the Iowa caucuses in 2008, but Obama saw enough of his foreign policy expertise to pick him as his vice president.

Fiorina, who lost a California Senate race in 2010, is touring early voting states to talk about women's issues and may be trying to put her name into the vice presidential chatter this time around, Johnson said.

Long-shot candidates also see a White House campaign as a way to highlight a favorite agenda. John Bolton would need an earthquake to win the nomination but the former U.S. ambassador to the U.N. is contemplating a presidential campaign to thrust his brand of hawkish foreign policy to the center of the Republican race.

Webb might play a similar role for Democrats with his strong anti-war views.

Long-shot candidates also sometimes see a White House race as a way of brokering their influence over a particular set of supporters. Rev. Jesse Jackson used presidential runs in the 1980s to win recognition as a leader of the African-American voting bloc, which is crucial for Democrats.

A presidential run can also serve as a vehicle for politicians, like O'Malley, who have higher ambitions but no obvious openings.

Some also-rans do enough to put themselves in the frame for Cabinet posts: former Iowa Governor Tom Vilsack ran briefly against Obama in the 2008 campaign and is now Agriculture Secretary.

Other candidates begin as long shots and become competitive over multiple campaigns. Ronald Reagan for instance ran for president twice before he won in 1980. Romney used his 2008 campaign to position himself for the nomination four years later.

If they don't get many votes, long-shot candidates can still damage the frontrunners.

Former Sen. Chris Dodd punctured Clinton's 2008 campaign aura of inevitability for the first time over her debate answer on driving licenses for illegal immigrants.

And some find out that running for president isn't as much fun as it looks.

Quirky 2008 Democratic candidate Mike Gravel couldn't get a word in as Clinton, Obama and Biden sparred in the 2008 debates and complained he was treated like a "potted plant."

MSNBC: Mitchell Calls Out Pfotenhauer on 'Accuracy' of Comparing Dem Nominee to Paris Hilton
(MSNBC 07/30/08 1:20pm)
ANDREA MITCHELL: We want to talk more about that new campaign ad from the John McCain camp. […] Tell me about the ad and the reasoning behind it: Why Paris Hilton? Why Britney Spears? It does seem that you're trying to demean Barack Obama.

NANCY PFOTENHAUER: Not at all. We're trying to acknowledge the fact that he is a world celebrity. […] But there's a big difference between being a world celebrity and being an American President. And the real question is that at a time when our country is facing the challenges that we're facing—in the economy, with rising energy prices; in Iraq and Afghanistan—who is best equipped to be that leader? And that's John McCain. And I think that's why you see […] polls as tight as they are […] And it's clear that he can't necessarily translate fans into voters. You can look back into the primaries and see how he can pack an arena with 35,000 people in Philadelphia and then lose the state by ten points.

MITCHELL: Well, let me give you the response now from the Obama campaign […] from Tommy Veeder. […] The basic line is, 'oops, he did it again.' Your turn, Nancy?

PFOTENHAUER: […] I would just point out to your viewers that Senator Obama attacked Senator McCain on the campaign trail every day. His campaign launched the first negative ad, not just in the general election season, but in the primaries as well

MITCHELL: Well, you guys said on that conference call, Rick Davis said that he launched the first negative ad. But […] we've gone back and checked the records, the first negative ad was the Republican National Committee ad. And then he -- his ad, Obama's, was in response to that Republican attack ad.

PFOTENHAUER: […] Well I think it's basically the pot calling the kettle black, if you will. But there are real differences between these two candidates and their vision for the future of this country and Senator McCain has proven that he's a leader and that he has served this country and put his country's interests first time and time again. And on one level Senator Obama's just given a speech about it.

MITCHELL: […] I'm not going to argue with you about the fact that John McCain is a real leader […] But I think the real question is whether your characterization of Barack Obama is accurate, when you say he's just given a speech, and he's a celebrity like Paris Hilton. I think comparing the Democratic nominee to Paris Hilton creates some questions, doesn't it?

PFOTENHAUER: […] His campaign has really, in a very methodical way, tried to build this sense of celebrity. […] I mean, there -- there's a lot of stagecraft that goes on here. It just doesn't mean there's any statecraft behind it. And that has resulted in things like alack of access to the media, really a lack of retail politics, if you will. […]

ABC's World News Tonight Opens with Candidate Mud-Slinging (ABC 07/30/08 6:30pm)

CHARLES GIBSON: It is a pledge made by every candidate in every campaign, to run on the issues and avoid negative attacks. Just last month, John McCain pledged that, throughout the campaign, he would show his admiration and respect for senator Obama. As for Obama, he pledged to run a different campaign; run a positive campaign. Well, that was then. Today, the fact attacks were flying so fast and furious, it was sometimes hard to keep up. […]

DAVID WRIGHT: […] The mud has, indeed, been flying. With Obama constantly comparing McCain to president Bush and today, McCain comparing Obama to empty celebrities, all sizzle, no substance. John McCain has been trying to raise doubts about his opponent. Today in Colorado, he was at it again.

JOHN MCCAIN: The bottom line is that Senator Obama's words, for all their eloquence and passion, don't mean all that much.

WRIGHT: McCain has recently said Obama would rather lose a war to win an election. He's called him Dr. No on energy reforms and run ads blaming Obama for high gas prices.

MCCAIN COMMERCIAL: He's the biggest celebrity in the world, but is he ready to lead?

WRIGHT: Today, McCain unveiled a new ad in 11 states, flashing images of Britney Spears and Paris Hilton, suggesting Obama is just another vapid celebrity.

MCCAIN COMMERCIAL: Higher taxes, more foreign oil. That's the real Obama.

STUART ROTHENBERG: Nobody's going to confuse Paris Hilton with Senator Barack Obama, but over time, the attempt to raise questions about his substance, that could very well work.

WRIGHT: The Obama campaign dismissed the ad as more of his steady stream of false negative attacks, or some might say, "Oops, he did it again."

BARACK OBAMA: We don't need the same, old, tired answers. What we need is something new.

WRIGHT: Obama told an audience in Missouri, the republicans are just trying to scare voters.

BARACK OBAMA: Their argument is, 'I know you don't like what we're doing, but he's risky.'

WRIGHT: A McCain spokesman shot back, 'This is a typically superfluous response from Barack Obama. Like most celebrities, he reacts to fair criticism with a mix of fussiness and hysteria.' Today, the McCain side released a memo noting, among other things, Obama's fondness for chocolate protein bars, black forest berry Honest Tea, and arugula.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In other words, high-maintenance like any big star, but Obama supporters are having none of it. Today, they called attention to the shoes McCain has worn on stops throughout the rust belt. Italian calfskin loafers that retail for $520 a pair. Late today, the Obama campaign responded to McCain's celebrity ad with a new ad of their own.

OBAMA COMMERCIAL: "False." "Baloney." "Baseless." John McCain, same old politics. Same failed policies.

WRIGHT: It's getting ugly early and some republicans are expressing concern about McCain's tone. In particular, one former McCain aide calling the new celebrity ad childish. The McCain campaign insists that Obama went negative first. Charlie.

GIBSON: […] There are still 97 days to go until election day. I suppose it could get worse. […]

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS: You think it's going to get worst, Charlie?

GIBSON: We're arguing about what teas people thing and shoes candidates wear. First of all, […] John McCain. What's the McCain strategy with these kinds of accusations, I guess, about Obama?

STEPHANOPOULOS: I think the strategy behind it is recognizing one fundamental fact about the campaign. Right now this, campaign is about Barack Obama. He is getting all the attention. He is the candidate voters are focused on and the McCain strategy is to define him before he can define himself and there is a tradition of this, Charlie.

Go back to 1988. Republicans put Michael Dukakis, the democratic candidate, in a tank. In 2004, remember that ad of John Kerry, when he was windsurfing, showing him as a flip-flopper. In each of those cases, the idea was to show that the democratic candidate is not one of us, is not a regular guy. They're trying to do the same thing now to Barack Obama, by comparing him to Britney Spears and Paris Hilton.

GIBSON: And what to the Obama people, and Obama himself, I guess, think of all this? and how do they intend to respond?

STEPHANOPOULOS: They scoff. They say first of all this, is a more serious time, than 1988 or 2004. We're a country at war. The economy's in the doldrums. People don't want to hear this kind of stuff.

They're also going to say that this is just John McCain being negative. He's got nothing positive to say. I think the big question here, is when voters see that ad, do they see it captures something essential about Barack Obama's character? Or do they think it's just a ridiculous caricature?

NBC Nightly News Leads with McCain Celeb Attack Ad (NBC 07/30/08 7:01pm)
BRIAN WILLIAMS: We have 98 days to go until the presidential election in this country. That means 98 days worth of promises from both candidates to keep the debate lofty and civil and, while they may say that, it's just as likely that both campaigns will keep putting TV ads on the air, tearing each other apart.

The latest ad to do that comes from the McCain campaign. It features two, young Hollywood starlets more famous for their public embarrassments than their public policy views. What do they have to do with Barack Obama and what about a counter-attack by the Obama campaign? […]

KELLY O'DONNEL: […] What's known as 'defining the opponent' is a critical phase in any presidential campaign and that was unmistakable today as John McCain tried to define, for voters, Barack Obama by mocking a perceived strength, Obama's popularity. In Aurora, CO today, John McCain first tried to avoid being seen as too angry, as his critics claim. So, before going negative on Obama, McCain tried going nice.

JOHN MCCAIN: I applaud his talent and his success and Americans—all Americans should be proud of his accomplishment.

O'DONNELL: With that said, McCain's campaign rolled out a TV ad about Obama they call, 'celeb.'

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

MCCAIN COMMERCIAL: He's the biggest celebrity in the world, but is he ready to lead?

O'DONNELL: Yes, you did see pop culture stars, Paris Hilton and Britney Spears alongside the democratic candidate.

COMMERCIAL: Higher taxes, more foreign oil. That's the real Obama.

O'DONNELL: Next, the campaign issued a memo, making this claim: [image of Rick Davis appears in corner of screen] 'Like most worldwide celebrities, this status has fueled a certain arrogance.' Today in Missouri, Barack Obama said he pays little attention to McCain ads.

BARACK OBAMA: He seems to only be talking about me. You need to ask John McCain what he's for, not just what he's against.

O'DONNELL: Arguing McCain has made a series of negative attacks, the Obama campaign could not resist playing off a Britney Spears hit song. As some might say, "Oops! He did it again." Team McCain maintains that Obama was first to run a negative spot, hitting McCain on TV three weeks ago.

OBAMA COMMERCIAL: On gas prices, John McCain's part of the problem.

O'DONNELL: Today McCain also tried to define himself, invoking the label, 'maverick,' and making an appeal to independents, expected to decide this race.

JOHN MCCAIN: I don't work for a party. I don't work for a president. I don't work for a special interest and I don't work for myself. I work for you and the country that we love.

O'DONNELL: And, quick to respond, the Obama campaign fired up the edit room and put together a spot they say will perhaps be on the air as early as tonight. It responds to the ad that you just saw and it will use some clips out of newspaper articles that will say that McCain has been negative and even, at times, false in his attacks on Obama.

WILLIAMS: […] What's at work here?

CHUCK TODD: Pretty simple, Brian. They simply want to paint Barack Obama as an elitist, sort of a bi-coastal elitist. He's got celebrity status. He may be like Bono or Paris Hilton, but he can't connect and he's not going to appeal to folks in Ohio, in Michigan, in Pennsylvania.

I mean, the McCain campaign feels very positive about this ad, that this is the way to sort of peal away the onion of Obama a little bit and get at this, say, 'Okay we'll run against his popularity and that working class voters in those key, industrial rust belt states will end up saying, you know what? I'm not for some international superstar. I'm for John McCain.'

WILLIAMS: And that figure we used at the top of the broadcast, for all the campaigning we've all lived through, 98 days now seems awfully close and it strikes me sooner or later these candidates are going to need running mates, what are you hearing on that front?

TODD: […] With John McCain it looks like he's going to wait until after the democratic convention and, I'll tell ya, you really only hear two names: Mitt Romney and Tim Pawlenty out of Minnesota.

McCain's Attack is Likely to Backfire (CBS 07/30/08 6:36pm)
KATIE COURIC: Turning now to the presidential campaign, which today seemed to be ripped from the pages of a celebrity magazine with supporting roles played by Britney Spears and Paris Hilton. John McCain sharpened his attack against Barack Obama, trying to turn his popularity against him and late today, Obama fired back. […]

CHIP REID: Just about everywhere Barack Obama goes the adoring crowds follow. 200,000 turned out to hear him speak last week in Germany. Here at home, his town hall meetings are standing-room only. Political commentators compare him to a rock star. Now the McCain campaign has decided to try to use Obama's celebrity status against him.

MCCAIN COMMERCIAL: He's the biggest celebrity in the world, but is he ready to lead?

REID: Today releasing an ad that compares Obama to those symbols of shallowness, Britney Spears and Paris Hilton. In a conference call today, McCain's topped a visor said the ad is intended to pose a stark choice.

STEVE SCHMIDT: Do the American people want to elect the world's biggest celebrity or do they want to elect an American hero?

REID: Political analyst, David Mark says the ad is sure to get a lot of attention, but do you think the Britney Spears/Paris Hilton ad is going to work for John McCain?

DAVID MARK: No, I think it's going to backfire. John McCain's campaign is predicated on the idea of loyalty, somebody of honor. This seems a little juvenile.

REID: Today the Obama campaign responded with an ad of their own.

OBAMA COMMERCIAL: John McCain, his attacks on Barack Obama: "Not true." "False." "Baloney." "The low road."

REID: Campaigning in Missouri, Obama took the high road.

BARACK OBAMA: You know, I don't pay attention to John McCain's ads. Although I do notice that he doesn't seem to have anything very positive to say about himself, does he? He seems to only be talking about me.

REID: Today an Obama campaign spokesman responded to the McCain attack ad by quoting Britney Spears saying, about McCain, "Oops, he did it again."

George W. Bush Advocates Lift on Congressional Offshore Drilling Ban (MSNBC 07/30/08 10:59am)
THE PRESIDENT: Good morning. I just finished a good Cabinet meeting, and I want to thank the members of my Cabinet for serving our country. We discussed the challenges facing our economy, amongst other things, and we spent time on the high gasoline prices. Every one of our citizens who drives to work or runs a small business is feeling the squeeze of rising prices at the pump, and they expect their elected leaders in Washington to take some common-sense action.

To reduce pressure on prices, we need to increase the supply of oil -- especially here at home. So in June, I called on Congress to lift the legislative ban that prevents offshore exploration on the Outer Continental Shelf. Unfortunately, Democratic leaders in Congress have refused to allow a vote. And now Congress is about to leave for its August recess without taking any action on this vital priority for the American people.

There is now a growing agreement across our country that the government should permit the exploration and development of these offshore oil resources.

Exploration of the OCS would increase our supply of oil here at home. Experts believe that currently restricted areas of the OCS could eventually produce up to about 18 billion barrels of oil. That's almost 10 years' worth of America's current oil production.

Exploration of the OCS would also create jobs for our citizens. Yesterday, I visited the Lincoln Electric Company in Cleveland, Ohio -- it's a business that produces welding products used for offshore exploration. If Congress were to permit exploration of the OCS, it would mean jobs at businesses such as these. American drivers on -- are counting on Congress to lift the ban on offshore exploration -- and so are American workers.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bringing OCS resources online is going to take time -- and that means that the need for congressional action is urgent. So I've lifted the executive restrictions on offshore exploration. I've done my part. And that means the only thing now standing now between the American people and these vast oil resources is the United States Congress. The sooner Congress lifts the ban, the sooner we can get this oil from the ocean floor to your gas tank.

Some members of Congress say they object to exploration of the OCS, but they are in favor of other actions -- such as taking oil out of the nation's Strategic Petroleum Reserve. Well, if you agree that we need more oil, it makes no sense to say you're for draining our nation's limited Strategic Reserve, but against tapping into the vast resources of the Outer Continental Shelf.

America needs to take every reasonable and responsible step we can do to reduce pressure on gasoline and energy prices. That's precisely what my administration is doing. We're working to expand domestic oil production. And at the same time, we're working to speed the development of new clean and alternative energy resources. We're raising fuel efficiency standards, expanding the use of alternative fuels, and investing in next-generation fuels such as cellulosic ethanol and biodiesel. We're investing in new advanced batteries, and plug-in hybrids, and hydrogen fuel cells. We're working to expand the use of clean, safe nuclear power, solar and wind power, and clean coal technology. With these steps, we're enhancing America's energy security -- and increasing the supply of clean, safe energy made right here in the United States of America.

The time for action is now. This is a difficult period for millions of American families. Every extra dollar they have to spend because of high gas prices is one less dollar they can use to put food on the table, or to pay the rent, or meet their mortgages. The American people are rightly frustrated by the failure of Democratic leaders in Congress to enact common-sense solutions -- like the development of the oil resources on the Outer Continental Shelf.

There are now just a couple of days left before Congress leaves for its August recess. Legislation to open up this offshore exploration is pending in both the House and the Senate -- all Democratic leaders have to do is allow a vote. They should not leave Washington without doing so.

Thank you very much.

McCain Supporter, Heather Wilson Avoids Shuster's Challenge to Reconcile Candidates' Contradictory Statements on Taxes (MSNBC 07/30/08 4:18pm)
DAVID SHUSTER: Square [McCain's vow that he won't support a tax increase] with the statement on Sunday when he said, 'Everything would be on the table,' including raising the payroll tax to save social security.

HEATHER WILSON: I think he's made a very clear commitment that he doesn't want to raise taxes.

Fancy Pants (or Shoes) McCain (CNN 07/30/08 6:55pm)
JEANNIE MOOST: We don't expect John McCain to be on a show string budget when it comes to shoes but 520 dollars Ferragamo calf skin leather loafers? That is right up there in John Edwards 400 dollar hair cut territory...

MOOST: It wasn't pretty when the liberal Huffington Post style section revealed Loafer Gate...

MOOST: We are guessing maybe the Senator has some help in the shoe shopping department from his fashion plate wife. But wasn't Senator Obama the guy being called in elitist? ...

MOOST: Presidential candidate McCain was spotted wearing his 520 dollar Italian shoes when he met with the Dalai Lama. Though it was hard to notice their feet, what with all the hand holding. The Dalai Lama was wearing sandals. So should they meet again perhaps this simple 275 dollar Prada sandal might work for Senator McCain.

Obama Vows to Up IL Defense Aid if Deal Approved

President Barack Obama promised Democratic lawmakers that the US will continue to keep economic pressure on Iran, keep military options open, and increase missile defense support to Israel if his administration's nuclear deal with Tehran goes through. Obama said in a letter addressed to New York Democratic Rep. Jerrold Nadler that if Iran rushes to build a nuclear weapon, "all of the options available to the United States — including the military option — will remain available." The president also said the US will uphold sanctions targeting Iran's non-nuclear activities, such as its support for Lebanon's Hezbollah group and what Obama calls Iran's "destabilizing role in Yemen." And the letter emphasizes US support for Israel, saying Obama has "consistently viewed Israel's security as sacrosanct."

77 Nuclear Non-proliferation Experts in Favor of Deal

Over 70 leading nuclear non-proliferation specialists issued a joint statement on Tuesday explaining why the nuclear deal with Iran "is a strong, long-term, and verifiable agreement that will be a net-plus for international nuclear nonproliferation efforts." The July 14 agreement "advances the security interests of the P5+1 nations (China, France, Germany, Russia, the United Kingdom, and the United States), the European Union, their allies and partners in the Middle East, and the international community," the statement reads. The group includes former U.S. nuclear negotiators, former senior U.S. nonproliferation officials, a former director-general of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), a former member of the UN Panel of Experts on Iran, and leading nuclear specialists.

Democratic Sen. Backs Deal though it 'Isn't Perfect'

President Obama's nuclear deal with Iran is picking up crucial support from swing-state Senate Democrats. On Thursday, Sen. Claire McCaskill, D-Mo., became the latest to declare her backing, saying in a statement: "This deal isn't perfect and no one trusts Iran, but it has become clear to me that the world is united behind this agreement with the exception of the government of Israel." McCaskill's announcement followed a similar declaration a day earlier from Sen. Joe Donnelly, D-Ind., who said: "I am willing to give this agreement the opportunity to succeed."

IL Demands Publication of Secret Agreements With Iran

Israel demanded on Thursday that the world powers that negotiated the nuclear agreement with Iran and the UN International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) publish all the secret agreements with Iran, along with their appendices, regarding the investigation into possible military dimensions of its nuclear program. The Israeli demand followed the AP report on Wednesday of a draft agreement between the IAEA and Iran regarding the inspection at the Parchin military site, where the Iranians are allegedly conducting experiments to build a nuclear weapon.

Terror Expert: Courting Iran is Like Riding a Tiger

With news of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas planning an official visit to Iran in November, and in light of an apparent rapprochement between Hamas and the Saudi royal family, the shifting alliances of the Middle East appear to have changed overnight. Yet what may seem like the re-shuffling of the strategic deck is actually the reassessment of a new political landscape, says Dr. Shaul Shay, a senior research fellow at the Institute for Counter-Terrorism at the Interdisciplinary Center in Herzliya. "What we see now is a kind of check on both sides in the Palestinian camp regarding their future policy in the region," suggests Shay, who has also served as the deputy head of Israel's National Security Council. "Unfortunately, almost all of the different players in the region understand the [recent nuclear] agreement as an Iranian achievement," argues Shay, and are therefore re-calibrating their positions regarding friends and foes.

IDF: Iran's Quds Force Responsible for Rocket Fire

The IDF struck targets in Syria on Thursday evening after four rockets were fired at northern Israel, with two landing in the Upper Galilee and two in the Golan Heights. The projectiles landed in open areas and there were no immediate reports of any casualties. One landed near a town, causing a fire. The IDF said it believed the firing was deliberate and that it was considering retaliatory fire. It also said the firing originated in Syria's Quneitra area, which is under Syrian President Bashar Assad's control and in which according to reports, Hezbollah operatives Samir Kuntar and Mustafa Mughniyeh have free rein. However, according to the IDF, Islamic Jihad was responsible for the fire, using Iranian funding and direction. The IDF also said it saw Syria as responsible for the fire. Islamic Jihad spokesman Daud Shihab strongly denied that the organization was responsible.

Israel's Other Existential Threat Comes From Within

By Hilik Bar

It used to be said by some in Israel that "only the right can bring peace." But the brave, pragmatic Zionist right of Menachem Begin is gone.
Successive right-wing governments have adopted the mantra "there is no partner for peace." Of course, the Palestinians have not been the perfect partner — and, of course, there is no such thing. You make peace with your enemies, as Yitzhak Rabin used to say.

In place of negotiations toward a two-state solution, however, the increasingly radicalized Israeli right has developed a strategy of "conflict management." The results are in: endless operations in Gaza, Israel's southern residents living under impossible conditions, Jerusalem on the verge of a third intifada, weakened Israeli deterrence and an Israel increasingly isolated in the world.

The only way for Israel now to remain both Jewish and democratic — that is, for Israel to remain a democracy and retain its Jewish majority — is to separate from the Palestinians via a two-state solution. Without such a settlement, Israel is drifting ineluctably toward becoming a binational state. And make no mistake: The logic of the binational state means an end to the Zionist project. This threat to Israel is so grave partly because it is happening at a slow enough pace that our leaders can essentially ignore the problem without facing electoral catastrophe.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu helped scupper Secretary of State John Kerry's push for peace by insisting on Palestinian recognition of Israel as "the Jewish state" — which is an important and fair demand, but not as a precondition for talks. Because of those fruitless efforts and the bitter wrangling over the Iran deal, the Obama administration probably has little interest in spending more political capital on reviving the peace process. So Israel must take the lead to secure its own interests and its own future.

I recently presented a plan at the Knesset that I hope will eventually become government policy. It is aimed at generating momentum toward a final status accord between us and the Palestinians. The broad parameters are already known, but there is more we should do.

Israel should recognize the Palestinian state at the United Nations. Recognition would be conditional on final borders and other essential elements of a deal being determined exclusively through negotiations. The dispute should no longer be about whether there will be two states, but about the details of an agreement.

Israel should also respond — for the first time — to the Arab Peace Initiative and conduct a regional dialogue in parallel with Israeli-Palestinian negotiations. Moderate members of the Arab League and the Organization of Islamic Cooperation that have endorsed that initiative could prove critical to achieving Israeli-Palestinian and regional agreements. Many of these states are now our strategic allies thanks to shared opposition to an Iranian bomb.

To build trust, Israel should refrain from construction over the Green Line in areas of the West Bank that would harm the contiguity of the Palestinian state. Illegal outposts built since March 2001 should be dismantled.

There has been much hand-wringing over the growth of the Jewish population over the Green Line, along with claims that this growth virtually precludes a two-state solution. This argument assumes that, to reach a deal, there must not be a single Jew in the Palestinian state. But why should there be no Jewish minority in a newly created state of Palestine, when there is a Palestinian minority in Israel? Those settlers whose homes remain outside Israel's final borders should be offered, under an agreement, residency or dual citizenship in the new Palestinian state, along with a guarantee of their security.

Jerusalem is on the verge of a third intifada. A number of steps could calm the volatile situation. Israeli police presence in East Jerusalem should be reduced. (At the same time, we should step up military and intelligence activity against Hamas and Islamic Jihad cells operating there.) A municipal body representing the Palestinian residents of East Jerusalem should be established and developed, to fill the vacuum left by the closing of Orient House in 2001, which functioned as an umbrella institution for civil institutions in East Jerusalem.

Mr. Netanyahu was right to call for Palestinian recognition of Israel as a Jewish state, but his insistence on such recognition as a precondition was both a ploy and an error. Both states should recognize each other in their sovereign borders — when an agreement is finalized.

Naturally, I will have my detractors. But I believe we have no choice but to confront these issues. Sleepwalking toward becoming a binational state, Israel faces an internal threat to its existence potentially no less severe than the external one of a nuclear-armed Iran. It must pursue the two-state solution no less fervently than it opposes an Iranian bomb. Only this path can safeguard Israel's long-term security.

Join Me at Sea

By Nahum Barnea

The USS destroyer Porter visited the Haifa port last Friday. Porter is one of the ships of the Sixth Fleet. It specializes in ballistic missiles. It gained fame in the first Gulf War when it launched Tomahawk missiles at targets in Saddam Hussein's Iraq. It has since been renovated and upgraded. Its current home port is Rota, Spain.

The American fleet is meticulous about ceremony. At every official visit of one of its vessels to a foreign port, the American ambassador honors it with a visit and is greeted on board with a full military ceremony. The ambassador usually invites a head of state, either the president or the prime minister or the defense minister—to board the ship with him. That's the protocol. The ceremony takes place in front of the cameras. It sends a triple message: America is strong; America is here; military relations are close.

The ceremony on the USS Porter took place in accordance with all the rules. The honor guard wore white. The commander, Commander Blair Guy, greeted the guests with a salute. US Ambassador to Israel Daniel Shapiro responded with a salute and reviewed the honor guard. He walked alone: he was not accompanied by a single Israeli official. Then the ambassador gave the usual speech about the US administration's commitment to Israel's security and the close cooperation between the two defense establishments. The job of the representative of the State of Israel at these ceremonies is to echo the ambassador: never was cooperation closer; American is by our side and we are by her side.

But no Israeli representative went to Haifa port. In their absence, there was something hollow, something phony about the ceremony. Like a wedding without a groom, like a check with no funds to cover it. The visit is meant to illustrate to Israelis and to their enemies, from Iran to ISIS, just how close relations are. It illustrated the opposite.

How did it happen that there were no Israelis at the Haifa ceremony? This is an instructive story. But before I tell it, I will go back 19 years to August 1996. The Enterprise aircraft carrier visits Haifa. US ambassador Martin Indyk invites Prime Minister Binyamin Netanyahu to board the ship with him while still at sea. Netanyahu accepts. He brings his wife Sara with him. A helicopter brings the group to the deck of the aircraft carrier. Netanyahu is invited to the bridge. The Americans go through the entire performance for the Israeli prime minister, just like in the movie Top Gun, but without Tom Cruise: combat fighters take off with huge noise as the guests watch, and they land on a dime. Netanyahu is as excited as a little boy. "I want three such aircraft carriers," he tells Indyk.

Ambassador Shapiro, from time to time—on average, once a month—holds a meeting with President Reuven Rivlin. In their last meeting, he suggested to the president that he go the USS Porter with him when the ship reaches Haifa. The president thanked him for the invitation but said that he could not go. In view of the disagreements between him and Netanyahu on the matter of relations with the US, his visit was liable to be interpreted as political intervention. He suggested to Shapiro that he invite Defense Minister Moshe Yaalon. Shapiro and his deputy chief of mission, Bill Grant, promised to try. If they received approval from Washington, they would invite the defense minister.

A few days later, the president met Yaalon at the Western Wall at a ceremony for bringing Torah scrolls to the synagogue there. Rivlin told Yaalon about the conversation and advised him to accept: it is very, very important that at this sensitive time in the relationship with the US administration for the defense minister to display a presence. This is a good way to lower the flames.

The US administration has a complicated history with Yaalon ever since the insults he hurled at Secretary of State John Kerry. Nonetheless, they invited him. The Defense Minister's Bureau replied that his schedule was full. He was unable to go to Haifa on Friday morning. The Americans made a note.

Did he turn down the invitation as part of Netanyahu's boycott policy of the Obama administration? I'm not certain. It seems that more than this was an act of malice, it was more of a missed opportunity. Such mishaps do happen to Yaalon from time to time. Sometimes they are due to his trying to be overly shrewd; sometimes it is due to simple imbecility.

Ofer Harel, the defense minister's media adviser, told me that the invitation reached Yaalon's desk a day or two before the ceremony and he could not clear his schedule. Talks with the Americans are taking place as usual, he said: the fact is: yesterday, on Thursday, Yaalon met with Gen. Philip Breedlove, the commander of the US European Command, who is visiting Israel as the guest of the IDF. Had he been boycotting the Americans, he would have missed the meeting (Chief of Staff Lt. Gen. Gadi Eisenkot proposed to Gen. Breedlove that he join him at the annual memorial ceremony of the Golani Brigade, held on Wednesday. The American accepted).

A Lost Cause

When it comes to relations with the Americans, it seems that there is more than one government in Israel. Netanyahu and his envoy in Washington, Ron Dermer, are waging a campaign against the agreement with Iran as if there were no tomorrow. Others in Israel, from the president on down, are trying to mediate and to moderate while the IDF is trying to work as usual, but its efforts are dwarfed by the heavy machinery being operated by the prime minister at the moment. Netanyahu is like the driver speeding full throttle down a hill but who won't step on the brakes lest he turn over.

Last week I described the way in which the White House views the activity of our ambassador to Washington, Ron Dermer, against the agreement signed with Iran. They claim that he goes from door to door on Capitol Hill and suggests to the senators and to the members of Congress that they vote against the president. No Israeli ambassador has ever dared act this way in any country. No foreign ambassador dares to behave this way in America. In other countries, Dermer would be declared persona non grata. He would have to pack and return to his country within 48 hours. The US administration is too arrogant to do this. At this stage it is making do with banning White House and State Department officials from meeting with the Israeli ambassador.

The word "unprecedented" is overly used in journalese. Events in our region usually do have a precedent—particularly bad news. There have been crises between the administration in Washington and the Israeli government in the past; there have been periods when they didn't talk. What justifies using the term "unprecedented" in the current crisis is that it is the Israeli government, not the US administration, that is cutting off contact. This is a lost cause: the agreement with Iran cannot be stopped. All that is left is ego, a pumped up chest, the attraction of playing in American domestic politics. This is not Israeli chutzpah; this is gambling in a casino, this is playing with fire.

President Obama spent a relaxing vacation this week with his family in Martha's Vineyard, an island off the Massachusetts coast. He played golf, he swam in the sea, he spent time with friends over dinner. The only political subject he addressed, according to American media reports, were phone calls to Democratic members of Congress on the matter of the agreement with Iran. Netanyahu phones, Dermer phones, Obama phones. No American president easily accepts such competition for the ears of his party's elected representatives.

The leaders of the Jewish community in the US are stuck in the middle. The term "community" is misleading: there is no community. There is no leadership. There is a lobby that follows the orders of the Israeli prime minister, some hacks have close ties to the royal family [the Netanyahus] and there are Republican billionaires whose ego has swollen to monstrous proportions along with their bank accounts. They sneer at Obama for all the wrong reasons, including the color of his skin. "Who's Obama," one said not long ago. "He is one of 350 million Americans."

Subject: Re: Agenda for 5:30 Post NH Messaging Call - TESTING SUGGESTIONS

Jim Andrews and I have been pouring through the oppo and have a couple new possible negatives to suggest we test in the poll, since most of our attacks haven't been working. We also proposed language for a split message test between where we've been (ideas that sound good on paper/ can't wait) versus the new no barriers message -- stacked up against Sanders

Hope these are helpful.

YOU PAY FOR SOCIALISM

Bernie Sanders says he wants to restructure America's economy to make it work like it does in the socialist countries of Europe, providing things like free health care for everyone, free college for everyone, and free increases in Social Security for everyone. But Sanders does not mention that the middle class picks up the bill in these countries, paying nearly sixty percent of their income in taxes, three times what middle class Americans pay now.

FREE STUFF FOR EVERYBODY

Bernie Sanders said –quote– "all necessities of life must be provided free for people," and over the years he's proposed a radical restructuring of the entire American economy to make many things free, from the gas for people's cars to telephones and now free college and health care. To do this, Sanders proposed the complete government takeover of all oil companies, gas companies, electric utility companies, phone companies, health care companies, and all television networks. Combined, Sanders proposals would put the government in control of more than half of the American economy, but Sanders has never told anyone who would pay for all of this or how it would work.

SPEND, TAX AND COVER IT UP

Bernie Sanders' spending plans cost at least eighteen trillion dollars, would increase government spending by 50% and equal the size of the current national debt. And it's actually worse. Experts say Sanders health care plan alone is quote –twice as expensive as he says it is and they say Sanders plans would increase middle class taxes by one third, even for people making less than nineteen thousand a year, and Sanders plans would raise the top tax rate to seventy seven percent. The Boston Globe said –quote "Sanders is not leveling with voters" about the real cost of his spending plans.

EXTREME ON NATIONAL SECURITY

Bernie Sanders' extreme views would gut America's national security and make less safe. Sanders ran for Congress calling for the military budget to be cut by more than half and spending the money on a "major electrified rail system" instead. In Washington, Sanders sponsored a law to unilaterally terminate America's entire nuclear weapons program and sponsored another law to cut the nuclear submarine fleet in half. In Congress, Sanders proposed massive cuts in the intelligence budget and earlier said we should shut down the entire CIA because –quote they "might even be able to overthrow the U.S. government if they chose to." Sanders is so ideologically committed to military cuts that just last year he said –quote we shouldn't spend money on the military "even if it does create jobs."

TROUBLING PATTERN ON CAMPAIGNING

Bernie Sanders says he's running a different kind of campaign, but the record tells another story. Last year a Sanders affiliated political action committee was fined by the federal election commission and Sanders staffers were caught hacking into computers and stealing data on political opponents. This year, Sanders got caught running ads that said he was endorsed by newspapers that actually endorsed his opponent and was forced to remove ads from the air. Sanders got caught claiming endorsements from organizations that endorsed his opponent and the American Legion is now threatening to sue him for falsely claiming he has their support.

TROUBLING PATTERN ON WOMEN

Bernie Sanders says he supports women's rights, but has a pattern of expressing and tolerating extreme views on women. Sanders once wrote that men fantasize about women being on their knees and women fantasize about being raped by three men simultaneously. Sanders wrote another article that connecting women's sexual behavior to breast cancer and said the way parents teach their daughter about sex –quote– "very well determine whether or not she will develop breast cancer." Now Sanders' supporters are flooding the internet with troubling comments about women quote –voting with their vaginas– and calling women who support Hillary Clinton quote –bitches.

BERNIE VS HRC MESSAGE TEST

BERNIE

Bernie Sanders says we have a corporate establishment whose greed is destroying the economy and a corrupt political establishment beholden to billionaires. Sanders says the billionaire class can't get huge tax breaks and hide profits overseas while the middle class is being hollowed out.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sanders says corporate America and the billionaire class have to start paying their fair share, and that to change things we need a political revolution to undo the power of corporate America and Wall Street. You sure can't change a corrupt system by taking its money. Sanders says one person alone can't change this country, but we can do it together.

HRC: BARRIERS

Hillary Clinton says we need to break down barriers of social injustice. Clinton says racism and sexism and other forms discrimination are not simply an effect of economic inequality, but are also part of the cause of economic inequality. Clinton says she will hold Wall Street accountable, but Wall Street is not gunning down young African Americans or denying immigrants a path to citizenship. Clinton says we can't move forward when women make seventy eight cents for each dollar men make, when people can be fired just because they're gay or when African American men go to prison at the same rate they graduate college. Clinton says that America can't reach its full potential when you're held back from reaching yours.

HRC CAN'T WAIT

Hillary Clinton says she is not interested in ideas that sound good on paper but will never make it the real world, and she won't make promises she can't keep. Clinton says the single mom who needs raise can't wait for plans that will never happen. The student with a mountain of debt can't wait. The grandmother who has to choose between paying for medicine and paying the rent can't wait. Clinton says she's spent a lifetime making a difference for people and getting results, from winning benefits for the National Guard and Reserve to winning health care for eight million children and she's ready to roll up her sleeves and get to work right now. Clinton says she's ready to tackle our toughest challenges and move our country forward.

PRESIDENT BARACK OBAMA: this is a good day. once again we're seeing what's possible with strong american diplomacy. as i said in my state of the union address, ensuring the security of the united states and the safety of our people demands a smart, patient and disciplined approach to the world. that includes our diplomacy with the islamic republic of iran. for decade, our differences meant our governments almost never spoke to each other. ult maltimately that did not advance america's interest. over the year iran moved closer and closer to having the ability build a nuclear weapon. from president franklin roosevelt to john f. kennedy to konlds ronald reagan, the united states has never been afraid to pursue diplomacy. we could advance by engaging directly with the iranian government. we've seen the results. under the nuclear deal that we, our allies and partners reached with iran last year, iran will not get its hands on a nuclear bomb. the region, the united states and the world will be more secure. as i've said many time, the nuclear deal was never intended to resolve all of our differences with iran, but engaging directly with the iranian government on a sustained basis for the first time in decades has created a unique opportunity, a window, to try to resolve important issues. today, i can report progress on a number of fronts. first, yesterday, marked a milestone in preventing iran from obtaining a nuclear weapon. iran has fulfilled key commitments under the nuclear deal. i want to explain why this is important. over more than a decade iran moved ahead with its program and before the deal it has installed nearly 20,000 centrifuges that could enrich uranium for a nuclear bomb. today, iran has removed two-thirds of those machines. before the deal, iran was increasing stockpile of enriched uranium. enough for up to ten nuclear bombs. today, more than 98% of that stockpile has been shipped out of iran. meaning iran doesn't have enough material for even one bomb. before, iran was nearly completion of a reactor capable of plutonium for a bomb. today it's been poured out and filled with concrete so it cannot be used again. before the deal, the world has relatively little visibility into iran's nuclear program. today inspectors are on the ground and the iran is being dealing with monitors. inspectors will monitor the facility 24 hours a day, 365 days a year. for decades to come, inspectors will have access to iran's entire nuclear supply chain. in other words, if iran tries to cheat, if they try to build a bomb covertly, we will catch them. the bottom line is this, where as iran was expanding its nuclear program, we have now cut off every single path that iran could have used to build a bomb. where as it would have taken iran two to three months to break out with enough material the rush with a bomb, we have extended that break out time to a year. with the world's unprecedented inspections and access to iran's program, we'll know if iran ever tries to break out. now that iran's actions have been verified, it can begin to receive relief from certain nuclear sanctions and gain access to its own money that had been frozen and perhaps most important of all, we achieved this through diplomacy without resulting to another war in the middle east. by working with iran on this nuclear deal, we were better able to address other issues. when our sailors in the persian gulf strayed into iranian waters that could have sparked a major international incident. some folks rushed to declare it was the start of another hostage crisis. we worked with the government to secure the lef our sailors in less than 24 hours. this brings me to a second major development. several americans unjustly detained by iran are finally coming home. in some cases these americans faced years of continued detention. i've met with some of their families. i've seen their anguish. how they ache for their sons and husbands. i gave these families my word. i made a vow that we could do everything to win the release of their loved ones and we have been tireless. on the sidelines of the nuclea negotiations our diplomats at the highest level, including secretary kerry, used every meeting to push iran to release our americans. i did so myself in my conversation with president rohani. after the nuclear deal was completed, the discussions between our governments accelerated. yesterday, these families finally got the news that they had been waiting for. jason is coming home. the courageous journalist for the washington post who wrote about the daily lives and hopes of the iranian people, he's been held for a year and a half. he embodies the brave spirit that gives life to the freedom of the press. jason has already been reunited with his wife and mom. pastor siyad is coming home. his unyielding faith has inspired people around the world. now he'll return to his church and community in idaho. a former sergeant in the marine corps. he's been held for four and a half years. today his parents and sisters are giving thanks in michigan. two other americans unjustly detained are also being released. an iranian who is in iran has a student. their cases were largely unknown to the world. when americans are freed, that's something we can all celebrate. i want to thank my national security team, especially secretary kerry. susan rice. brett mcgurk, avril haynes. our team worked tirelessly to get them home. iran has agreed to deepen our coordination as we worked to locate robert levinson, missing from iran for eight years. we'll never forget about bob. each and every day our hearts are with the family and we'll not rest until their families home again. the individuals were not charged with terrorism or any violent offenses. they are civilians and the release is a one time gesture to iran given the unique opportunity offered by there moment in larger circumstances at play. it reflects our willingness to engage to advance our mutual interest. nuclear deal implemented.

Part 2 Rough Transcript

PRESIDENT BRACK OBAMA: american families reunited. the third piece of this work we got done was the united states and iran resolving a financial dispute that dated back three decades. we worked through a international tribunal to resolve claims with our countries. we're settling a long standing iranian government claim against the united states government. iran will be returned its own funds, including a appropriated interest. much less than the amount iran sought. for the united states, the settlement could save us billions of dollars that could have been pursued by iran. here was no benefit to the united states in dragging this out. with nuclear deal done, prisoners released, the time was right to resolve this dispute as well. of course, even as we implement the nuclear deal and welcome our americans home, we recognize that there are profound differences between the united states and iran. we remain steadfast and opposing iran's destabilizing behavior elsewhere. we still have sanctions on iran for violations of human rights for support of terrorisms and for its ballistic missile program. we will continue to enforce these sanctions vigorously. iran's recent missile test was a violation of its international obligations. as a result the united states is imposing sanctions on individuals and companies working to advance iran's ballistic missile program. we're going to remain vigilant about it. we're not going to waiver in the defense our our security or allies and partners. i do want to speak directly to the iranian people. yours is a great civilization with a vibrant culture that has so much to contribute to the world in commerce and science and arts. for decades your government's threats and actions to destabilize the region has isolated iran from much of the world. now our governments are talking to each other. following the nuclear deal, you, especially young irans have the opportunity to build new ties with the world. we have a rare chance to pursue a new path. a different, better future that delivers progress for our people and the wider worlds. that's the opportunity before the iranian people. we need to take advantage of that. to my fellow americans, today we're united in welcoming home sons and husbands who in lonely prison cells have endured an absolute nightmare. they never gave in and they never gave up. at long last they can stand tall and bring deep the fresh air of freedom. as a nation, we face real challenges around the world and here at home. many of them will not be resolved quickly or easily. today's progress, americans coming home, an iran that's rolled back its nuclear program and accepted unprecedented monitoring of that program, these things are a reminder of what we can achieve when we leave with strength and wisdom, with courage and resolve and patience. america can do and has done big things when we work together. we can leave this world and make it safer and more secure for our children and grandchildren for generations to come. i want to thank, once again, secretary kerry, our entire national security team led by susan rice. i'm grateful for all the assistance that we received from our allies and partners. i'm hopeful this signals the opportunity for iran to work more cooperatively with nations around the world to advance their interests and the interest of people who are looking for peace and security for their families. thank you so much. god bless you. god bless the united states of america.

Barack Obama, 2007

Thank you so much. To the great Governor of Iowa and Lieutenant. Governor of Iowa. To my dear friend Tom Harkin for the outstanding work that he does. To the congressional delegation of Iowa that is doing outstanding work and to Nancy Pelosi , Madam Speaker, thank you all for the wonderful welcome and the wonderful hospitality.

[Responding to audience] I love you back.

A little less than one year from today, you will go into the voting booth and you will select the President of the United States of America. Now, here's the good news -- the name George W. Bush will not be on the ballot. The name of my cousin Dick Cheney will not be on the ballot. We've been trying to hide that for a long time. Everybody has a black sheep in the family. The era of Scooter Libby justice, and Brownie incompetence, and Karl Rove politics will finally be over.

But the question you're going to have to ask yourself when you caucus in January and you vote in November is, "What's next for America?" We are in a defining moment in our history. Our nation is at war. The planet is in peril. The dream that so many generations fought for feels as if it's slowly slipping away. We are working harder for less. We've never paid more for health care or for college. It's harder to save and it's harder to retire. And most of all we've lost faith that our leaders can or will do anything about it.

We were promised compassionate conservatism and all we got was Katrina and wiretaps. We were promised a uniter, and we got a President who could not even lead the half of the country that voted for him. We were promised a more ethical and more efficient government, and instead we have a town called Washington that is more corrupt and more wasteful than it was before. And the only mission that was ever accomplished is to use fear and falsehood to take this country to a war that should have never been authorized and should have never been waged.

It is because of these failures that America is listening, intently, to what we say here today -- not just Democrats, but Republicans and Independents who've lost trust in their government, but want to believe again.

And it is because of these failures that we not only have a moment of great challenge, but also a moment of great opportunity. We have a chance to bring the country together in a new majority -- to finally tackle problems that George Bush made far worse, but that had festered long before George Bush ever took office -- problems that we've talked about year after year after year after year.

And that is why the same old Washington textbook campaigns just won't do in this election. That's why not answering questions, because we are afraid our answers won't be popular just won't do. That's why telling the American people what we think they want to hear instead of telling the American people what they need to hear just won't do. Triangulating and poll-driven positions because we're worried about what Mitt or Rudy might say about us just won't do. If we are really serious about wining this election Democrats, we can't live in fear of losing it.
This party -- the party of Jefferson and Jackson; of Roosevelt and Kennedy -- has always made the biggest difference in the lives of the American people when we led, not by polls, but by principle; not by calculation, but by conviction; when we summoned the entire nation to a common purpose -- a higher purpose. And I run for the Presidency of the United States of America because that's the party America needs us to be right now.

A party that offers not just a difference in policies, but a difference in leadership.

A party that doesn't just focus on how to win but why we should. A party that doesn't just offer change as a slogan, but real, meaningful change -- change that America can believe in. That's why I'm in this race. That's why I am running for the Presidency of the United States of America -- to offer change that we can believe in.

I am in this race to tell the corporate lobbyists that their days of setting the agenda in Washington are over. I have done more than any other candidate in this race to take on lobbyists -- and won. They have not funded my campaign, they will not get a job in my White House, and they will not drown out the voices of the American people when I am President. I'm in this race to take those tax breaks away from companies that are moving jobs overseas and put them in the pockets of hard working Americans who deserve it. And I won't raise the minimum wage every ten years -- I will raise it to keep pace so that workers don't' fall behind.

That is why I am in it. To protect the American worker. To fight for the American worker.
I'm in this race because I want to stop talking about the outrage of 47 million Americans without health care and start actually doing something about it. I expanded health care in Illinois by bringing Democrats and Republicans together. By taking on the insurance industry. And that is how I will make certain that every single American in this country has health care they can count on and I won't do it twenty years from now, I won't do it ten years from now, I will do it by the end of my first term as President of the United States of America.

I run for president to make sure that every American child has the best education that we have to offer -- from the day they are born to the day they graduate from college. And I won't just talk about how great teachers are -- as President I will reward them for their greatness -- by raising salaries and giving them more support. That's why I'm in this race.

I am running for President because I am sick and tired of democrats thinking that the only way to look tough on national security is by talking, and acting, and voting like George Bush Republicans.

When I am this party's nominee, my opponent will not be able to say that I voted for the war in Iraq; or that I gave George Bush the benefit of the doubt on Iran; or that I supported Bush-Cheney policies of not talking to leaders that we don't like. And he will not be able to say that I wavered on something as fundamental as whether or not it is ok for America to torture -- because it is never ok. That's why I am in it.

As President, I will end the war in Iraq. We will have our troops home in sixteen months. I will close Guantanamo. I will restore habeas corpus. I will finish the fight against Al Qaeda. And I will lead the world to combat the common threats of the 21st century -- nuclear weapons and terrorism; climate change and poverty; genocide and disease. And I will send once more a message to those yearning faces beyond our shores that says, "You matter to us. Your future is our future. And our moment is now."

America, our moment is now.

Our moment is now.

I don't want to spend the next year or the next four years re-fighting the same fights that we had in the 1990s.

I don't want to pit Red America against Blue America, I want to be the President of the United States of America.

And if those Republicans come at me with the same fear-mongering and swift-boating that they usually do, then I will take them head on. Because I believe the American people are tired of fear and tired of distractions and tired of diversions. We can make this election not about fear, but about the future. And that won't just be a Democratic victory; that will be an American victory.

And that is a victory America needs right now.

I am not in this race to fulfill some long-held ambitions or because I believe it's somehow owed to me. I never expected to be here, I always knew this journey was improbable. I've never been on a journey that wasn't.

I am running in this race because of what Dr. King called "the fierce urgency of now." Because I believe that there's such a thing as being too late. And that hour is almost upon us.

I don't want to wake up four years from now and find out that millions of Americans still lack health care because we couldn't take on the insurance industry.

I don't want to see that the oceans have risen a few more inches. The planet has reached a point of no return because we couldn't find a way to stop buying oil from dictators.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I don't want to see more American lives put at risk because no one had the judgment or the courage to stand up against a misguided war before we sent our troops into fight.

I don't want to see homeless veterans on the streets. I don't want to send another generation of American children to failing schools. I don't want that future for my daughters. I don't want that future for your sons. I do not want that future for America.

I'm in this race for the same reason that I fought for jobs for the jobless and hope for the hopeless on the streets of Chicago; for the same reason I fought for justice and equality as a civil rights lawyer; for the same reason that I fought for Illinois families for over a decade.

Because I will never forget that the only reason that I'm standing here today is because somebody, somewhere stood up for me when it was risky. Stood up when it was hard. Stood up when it wasn't popular. And because that somebody stood up, a few more stood up. And then a few thousand stood up. And then a few million stood up. And standing up, with courage and clear purpose, they somehow managed to change the world.

That's why I'm running, Iowa -- to give our children and grandchildren the same chances somebody gave me.

That's why I'm running, Democrats -- to keep the American Dream alive for those who still hunger for opportunity, who still thirst for equality.

That's why I'm asking you to stand with me, that's why I'm asking you to caucus for me, that's why I am asking you to stop settling for what the cynics say we have to accept. In this election -- in this moment -- let us reach for what we know is possible. A nation healed. A world repaired. An America that believes again. Thank you very much everybody.

Mediators Race Against Clock to Extend Gaza Truce

Mediators worked against the clock on Thursday to extend a Gaza truce between Israel and the Palestinians as the three-day ceasefire went into its final 24 hours. Israel has said it is ready to agree to an extension as Egyptian mediators pursued talks with Israelis and Palestinians on an enduring end to a war that devastated the Hamas-ruled enclave, while Palestinians want an Israeli-Egyptian blockade of Gaza to be lifted and prisoners held by Israel to be freed. "Indirect talks are ongoing and we still have today to secure this," an Egyptian official said when asked whether the truce was likely to go beyond Friday. "Egypt's aims are to stabilise and extend the truce with the agreement of both sides and to begin negotiations towards a permanent agreement to cease fire and ease border restrictions."

US Envoy Arrives in Cairo for Gaza Truce Talks

Acting US special envoy for Palestinian-Israeli negotiations Frank Lowenstein landed Thursday in Cairo where he is scheduled to meet with the Egyptian foreign minister and other officials to discuss extending Gaza's ceasefire. The ceasefire is scheduled to end at 8 a.m. Friday unless a deal is reached to extend it.

Lowenstein said Egypt was working hard to try to prolong the ceasefire so to give negotiators enough time to reach an agreement on a long-term truce.

EU Powers Propose: Gaza Reconstruction for Hamas Disarmament

Germany, France and Britain presented Israel with an initiative to rehabilitate the Gaza Strip, subject to an international supervision apparatus that will prevent the rearmament of Hamas and other terror groups in the Strip. The proposal by the three European states is an answer to Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's demand for the disarmament of Hamas during the fighting in Gaza. The ambassadors of Germany and France and the deputy ambassador of Britain, who met with National Security Adviser Yossi Cohen in Jerusalem on Wednesday, gave him a two-page document of principles for international agreement about the Gaza Strip.

Obama Backs Truce Efforts, Seeks Easing of Gaza Isolation

President Barack Obama on Wednesday backed Egyptian efforts to broker a durable Israel-Hamas ceasefire in Gaza but also called for a longer-term solution that provides for Israeli security while offering Gaza residents hope they will not remain "permanently closed off from the world." Obama said the short-term U.S. goal is to make sure that a 72-hour truce holds and is extended beyond its Friday deadline, including the cessation of cross-border rocket fire by the Palestinian Islamist group Hamas, which controls the Gaza Strip.

Netanyahu: Hamas, Like ISIS, Must Be Ostracized by World

At his first press conference since the 72-hour cease-fire began, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu told foreign journalists Wednesday that the goal of the operation was and remains the protection of Israeli civilians. The war was "justified," Netanyahu said. "It was proportionate." Hamas is a world problem just like ISIS and Boko Haram, Netanyahu said, and must be ostracized from the family of nations. "It's important to understand what kind of condition our forces were facing in Gaza," Netanyahu said, after showing videos of rockets launched from residential areas in Gaza. "That is an example again of the use of civilians" by Hamas.

Netanyahu Asks U.S. Lawmakers to Help Fend Off War Crimes Charges

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has asked United States legislators to assist Israel in fending off charges that Israel committed war crimes during its month-long operation in Gaza, the New York Post reported on Wednesday. "The prime minister asked us to work together to ensure that this strategy of going to the International Criminal Court does not succeed," Democratic congressman Steve Israel told the Post by phone from Tel Aviv. Israel was one of a group of American lawmakers who met with Netanyahu in Israel on Wednesday.

Liberman Slams UN for Not Ridding Gaza of Hamas

Foreign Minister Avigdor Liberman responded Wednesday night to the UN condemning Israeli attacks on UNRWA facilities as "outrageous, unacceptable, and unjustifiable." UN officials should ensure their facilities are not being used to store weapons and launch rocket attacks, the foreign minister said, adding that institutions such as the UN Human Rights Council must not become a platform to embolden and encourage terrorism. Had the UN been fulfilling its duties, in accordance with the principles on which it was founded, the organization would create an international body to rid Gaza of Hamas' terror regime rather than wait for Israel to do it.

Jordan Seethes over Gaza Dead, Testing Israel Relations

Nowhere in Jordan, from the Syrian border to the expanse of Wadi Rum, is there refuge from uniform anger at the Israeli government for its war against Hamas in Gaza, now coming to a close after dozens of tunnels into Israel were destroyed, and 1,900 Gazan lives were lost. In a country where half the population is of Palestinian origin, that anger comes as no surprise. But on the streets of its capital, a political consensus has formed that this time might be different: that among the reforms Abdullah has promised, relations with Israel may now be among the peoples' demands.

New York Times – August 6, 2014

Making the Gaza Cease-Fire Last

Editorial

In the first good news in a long time, a 72-hour cease-fire appeared to be holding on Wednesday as Israelis and Palestinians tallied what was lost, and gained, during the latest war over the desperate Gaza Strip.

It was easiest to count the losses. More than 1,800 Palestinians, a majority of them noncombatants, and 67 Israelis have been killed. United Nations officials said 408 Palestinian children were killed and 2,502 injured. The physical damage in Gaza is estimated at $6 billion.

There are important but less tangible costs: the way ordinary Israelis have had to live in fear of rocket attacks; increasingly bitter strains on Israel's relations with the United States; international criticism of Israel — and the outrage of anti-Semitic protests and violence in Europe. There seems to be little room left in Israeli politics for those who would end the occupation of the West Bank and Gaza and create an independent Palestinian state.

Both sides are tallying the blame. In too many cases, Israel launched weapons that hit schools and shelters and failed to adequately protect Palestinian citizens. But Hamas knowingly targeted Israeli civilian centers in violation of any civilized standard and launched weapons from populated areas in what looks like a deliberate effort to draw Israeli fire on innocents.

Both sides are claiming victory, Israel for wiping out 32 underground tunnels that Hamas intended for attacks on Israel, and Hamas for still being alive. In a mockery of its claim to have a political arm independent of its armed wing, political officials of Hamas were crowing about its determination to regroup and attack again.

The bottom line is that neither side has achieved its main goal of destroying the other. Israel is not going away. But neither are the Palestinians, and the extremists among them will always find a place and an audience if there is no hope and no responsible moderate leaders to point the way to a better future.

The Israeli-Palestinian conflict is no longer a narrowly defined problem that can be endured, contained or even managed. To an unusual degree, the Middle East is unsettled — from refugee flows, the spread of Sunni militants between Syria and Iraq, the Sunni-Shiite rivalry and even intra-Sunni divisions. Sunni forces in Iraq are attacking Kurdish and Christian populations. There is extremism and instability everywhere in the region.

That is why it so important that indirect talks between Israelis and Palestinians in Cairo this week, mediated by Egypt, lay the ground for something bigger and more durable than one cease-fire. Certain conditions are clear. Rocket attacks into Israel by Hamas and other extremist groups must stop, along with other terrorist attacks. So does the smuggling of weapons into Gaza and the production of a new supply of rockets. There will need to be an international donors' conference to rebuild Gaza, but with assurances that Hamas will not divert money for civilian projects into rockets and tunnels. Otherwise, there is little chance that Israel would end the blockade that has kept Gazans confined to the strip, and deprived them of imports, exports and jobs.

Hamas wants Israel to release prisoners. The Palestinian Authority, which recognizes Israel, wants a role in controlling the border crossings between Israel and Gaza. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu of Israel, has signaled an eagerness to have the authority extend its reach to Gaza. But it cannot just be a policeman. If any agreements come out of Cairo, they must be designed to strengthen the authority and its president, Mahmoud Abbas, by managing whatever funds are donated to Gaza. It may be necessary to have Hamas in Cairo, but the group offers Palestinians nothing except nihilism and endless suffering.

We always wish a tragedy like this will finally create a real push for a permanent peace, but, right now, keeping this fragile peace is a big enough goal.

Saudi Arabia and the Third Gaza War

By Bruce Riedel

The Kingdom of Saudi Arabia has assumed a very low profile so far during the third Gaza war, speaking publicly rarely and primarily backing its Egyptian ally behind the scenes. Some have confused this quiet as a tacit entente with Israel against Hamas misreading the Saudi position; the kingdom increasingly regards the Netanyahu government as a criminal state. The Saudis have been unusually taciturn for much of the Gaza war between Hamas and the Israel Defense Forces (IDF).

The Saudi finance minister announced a $53 million grant for emergency aid to Gaza on July 14 to help the victims of "brutal Israeli aggression," but the king did not speak out personally until Aug. 1. King Abdullah bin Abdulaziz then denounced Israel for committing a "war crime against humanity" and engaging in a "collective massacre." He did not specifically mention Israel, but the official Saudi press made clear he meant Israel in general and Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu in particular.

The king never mentioned Hamas at all, but he did speak a great deal about "terrorists" who "distort the pure and humane image of Islam." The Saudi press has explained those remarks as applying to al-Qaeda and the Islamic State (IS), not to Hamas. He did say the worst kind of terror is state terror, another reference to Israel in Saudi speak. The former head of Saudi intelligence, Prince Turki Al Faisal, wrote for Al-Monitor on July 25 that Israel's actions in Gaza are a

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"barbaric assault on innocent civilians" and were destroying any chance for implementing the Saudi peace plan for a two-state solution.

Prince Turki, who is today a private citizen and always candid, did strongly criticize Hamas for many "mistakes," especially its "ill-advised alignment with Qatar and Turkey," both of whom have backed Hamas more vigorously. The Saudi ambassador in London wrote a public letter criticizing those who suggested any collusion between Israel and Saudi Arabia in Gaza as "utter rubbish" and "baseless lies." Prince Nawaf accused Israel of "genocide" and "a crime against humanity" in Gaza. He was responding to right-wing Israeli press reports alleging contacts between Saudi national security adviser Prince Bandar and the head of the Mossad and British press reports also asserting back-door collusion.

The Saudis' major goal in the Gaza war is to support their protege and ally Egyptian President Abdel Fattah al-Sisi, whom the Saudis helped put in power a year ago and whom they keep in power with billions in economic grants. Riyadh and Cairo now despise the Muslim Brotherhood. Since Hamas is the Palestinian offshoot of the Egyptian Brotherhood, Sisi wants to see it humiliated. This is the major difference between this Gaza war and the last Gaza war in 2012 when the then-Brotherhood controlled government in Cairo supported Hamas.

Abdullah and the other royal princes in Saudi Arabia are well aware that many Saudis, especially young people, admire Hamas for fighting against Israel. The royals are not eager to appear soft on Israel especially when gruesome images of dead children are appearing every night on Arab television. Israel and Saudi Arabia have colluded in the past when their interests coincided. The best example is Yemen in the 1960s when they each supported a royalist insurgency against an Egyptian occupation army. The Mossad parachuted supplies to the royalists while the Saudis provided sanctuary to them so they could bog Nasser's Egypt down in an Arabian Vietnam. The Mossad and Saudi intelligence cooperated indirectly via British mercenaries, but the Saudis always refused to meet the Israelis face to face.

The Israelis and Saudis were also on the same side in the Cold War against the Soviet Union. Despite what the movie "Charlie Wilson's War" leads you to believe, however, they did not cooperate in the final and decisive battle of the Cold War, the campaign in Afghanistan waged by the mujahedeen against the Soviet 40th Red Army. In fact, the Saudis vetoed any Israeli role in the Afghan war when the CIA and Congressman Wilson raised the idea.
The Saudis and Israelis have more often been on opposite sides of Middle East conflicts. The kingdom backed Iraqi President Saddam Hussein in the Iran-Iraq war, for example, while Israel backed the ayatollahs of Iran. King Fahd was adamant that Israel stay out of the Kuwait war in 1991. The kingdom today finds it very awkward to be in the same camp as Israel in calling for tough measures to ensure Iran does not get a nuclear bomb.

Saudi reluctance to partner even indirectly with Israel reflects both strategic and tactical considerations. The kingdom is a strong supporter of Palestinian rights; from firsthand experience I can attest the king is particularly committed to the Palestinian cause. He scolded US Secretary of State Colin Powell for US support to Ariel Sharon in the second intifada in a Paris meeting and almost accused the secretary of being a party to war crimes then.

The Palestinian issue has great resonance with average Saudis. It has been the main irritant in the US-Saudi relationship since it began in 1945 when President Franklin D. Roosevelt met King Ibn Saud in the Suez Canal to create the oldest US partnership with a Middle East state. In 1973, of course, King Faisal cut off oil exports to the United States over the Arab-Israel conflict, the lowest low point in the relationship's history. US-Saudi relations have historically thrived when the Americans are actively and successfully engaged in promoting peace between Israel and the Palestinians.

Tactically, the Saudis do not trust the Israelis to keep secrets. One Saudi prince once told me the Israelis are like "cheap tarts" who can not keep their mouths shut about their trysts. They undoubtedly suspect the Israeli right wing is actively promoting talk of collusion today to make life more difficult for the king.

The king's Aug. 1 speech also laid out his main priority today, which is fighting the growth of al-Qaeda and its offsprings on the kingdom's borders. The creation of a self-proclaimed caliphate in Iraq and Syria by IS is a direct challenge to the monarchy's legitimacy, if there is a true caliph then the king and the House of Saud are usurpers wrongly ruling Mecca and Medina. Saudi forces have been reinforced on the Iraqi-Saudi border as IS has advanced this summer. In the south, al-Qaeda in the Arabian Peninsula (AQAP) attacked a Saudi border outpost this summer and despite an enormous Saudi effort over six years now AQAP is far from defeated. Indeed, Yemen is becoming less stable with AQAP in south Yemen still dangerous and pro-Iranian Zaydi Houthi rebels controlling more and more of northern Yemen on the Saudi border. The Saudis have fought several border conflicts with the Houthis.

The coup in Egypt is the most positive development the king has seen in the region since the start of the Arab Spring. Abdullah has staked the kingdom's pocket book behind keeping Sisi in power and that determines his Gaza policy. As for Netanyahu, the Saudi ambassador to the United Kingdom laid out the kingdom's policy when he wrote Netanyahu "will answer for his crimes before a higher authority than here on earth."

Subject:	WJC questions

Dear John, Sandy, Nancy, and Strobe, as you may know, WJC is doing Q+A with Nick Kristof on Wednesday (at the Foursquare Conference). It's supposed to be closed press, but. Below are the questions they sent that are related to international issues – namely Israelis/Palestinians, China (trade/Tibet/Taiwan), and Greece/Euro. Are there any WJC Admin accomplishments that we should equip him to be able to highlight? [I put some initial ideas in CAPS below; and we also have requested input from the State Department.] We'd welcome any feedback by Sunday. Thanks, Ami

At the very end of your presidency, it seemed that you came a whisker from a Middle East peace deal, and the Clinton parameters are still generally acknowledged to be the basis of an Israeli-Palestinian peace deal if it comes. But will it ever come? Aren't demographics and the growth of settlements making it harder to see a two –state solution emerging any time soon?

For most of human history, China has been the dominant power in the world. We just happen to live in a relatively brief 300-year stretch when China was weak. But is China regaining its customary position as the dominant power in the world today, and should that worry us? Should we just get used to it? And given that China is our creditor, where do we find leverage to change Chinese behavior, whether on Tibet or Taiwan or human rights or trade?

1. REMINDER ABOUT GETTING CHINA INTO WTO; AND DEVELOPING APEC TO ENHANCE REGIONAL INFLUENCE; AND WJC ADMIN SUCCESS IN BUILDING-UP THE US ECONOMY AND IMPORTANCE OF HAVING DOMESTIC ECONOMIC STRENGTH

Greece looks as if it's headed for default, the Euro zone may be imploding, and the American economy is pretty much stagnant. If you were president today, what would you be doing right now?

1. REMINDER ABOUT BAILING OUT MEXICO AND HOW UNPOPULAR THAT WAS BUT ENDED UP BEING SUCCESSFUL – IMPORTANCE OF SOMETIMES HAVING TO MAKE UNPOPULAR DECISIONS
2. AND IMPORTANCE OF INVESTING IN JOB CREATION AS A WAY TO WORK OUT OF THIS CRISIS AND GIVE PEOPLE TOOLS THEY NEED TO LIFT THEMSELVES UP – MENTION WJC ADMIN ACCOMPLISHMENTS

There are a lot of potential crises that give nightmares to international strategists. A nuclear Iran. A belligerent or collapsing North Korea. A revolution in Saudi Arabia. A naval clash with China. Cyber attack. So what keeps you awake at night? Which of these do you worry about most? Or is there another peril that we in the media haven't adequately spotlighted?

1. REMIDER ABOUT WJC'S THREE CHALLENGES AND HOW WJC ADMIN HELPED ADDRESS EACH ONE, DIRECTLY AND INDIRECTLY: UNEQUALITY (IN INCOMES/OPPORTUNITY), INSTABILITY (DUE TO GLOBAL INTERCONNECTEDNESS, DISEASE AND HATE AND EVERYTHING CAN BE SPREAD ACROSS BORDERS EASILY), UNSUSTAINABILITY (DUE TO RESOURCE SCARCITY AND CLIMATE CHANGE)

The McMindfulness Craze: The Shadow Side of the Mindfulness Revolution

Jeffrey B. Rubin, Truthout: Focusing on the problems already identified with the McMindfulness craze obscures a more profound issue - meditation neglects meaning. This not only opens the door to grave dangers, but also compromises meditation's radical emancipatory potential.

CHRISTIAN BROADCASTING NETWORK: THE BRODY FILE (PARTIAL TRANSCRIPT): JULY 3, 2014

[Transcript]

(Starting at 15:45)

DAVID BRODY: You know there's been a lot of talk lately about 2016. You heard from Marco Rubio earlier in the show. He's a man expected to make a run at the Republican nominee for president. Well, how about a Brody File commentary on the woman who is expected to run to be the Democrats' nominee? Hillary Clinton. That's right. She's been taking some flack from the media ever since her book tour rollout began. And now, time for a Brody File commentary.

You know, remember the "we were dead broke when we left the White House" line? She uttered that to Diane Sawyer during the sit-down interview. Hey, yeah, sure it wasn't said very artfully, and I'm sure she wishes she could have said it differently, but you know technically it was true. It just seems the media wants to turn everything into political Armageddon. I mean how about when Hillary Clinton was talking about gay marriage? There was a liberal NPR host, and she tried to trip her up by chastising her for being for the Defense of Marriage Act back in the 1990s.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Yet, of course, now she is for same-sex marriage. The NPR host was trying to make Hillary Clinton look like a follower rather than a leader on the issue. But hey look, at the time, Pres. Clinton with support from Hillary Clinton did the smart thing by passing the Defense of Marriage Act. I mean, Congress wanted it, it was in a day when traditional marriage was still sacred. It really did make total sense. Politicians should really listen to the people – not the other way around. So sure, coming out for gay marriage back then would have been risky politically, but it would have also been tone-deaf and stupid, because the people weren't clamoring for it. People need to cut her and him some slack. She is for gay marriage now. I mean isn't that enough for gay rights activists? You know, it seems everyone is trying to trip Hillary up. But remember, she gives just as good as she gets. I think her biggest challenge is to let the inner-Hillary come out. Now conservatives might think the inner-Hillary is some mean-crazed machine, but actually she's really endearing in private. We've met her a few times. She's got a great sense of humor, loads of personality, so she's going to need to figure out a way for that to shine through more and not get so caught up in the trappings of her political past.

Washington Post blog: Post Politics: "Hillary Clinton tops Christie, Paul, Bush in new poll"

By Sean Sullivan

July 8, 2014, 9:16 a.m. EDT

Former secretary of state Hillary Rodham Clinton is in the driver's seat for the 2016 Democratic nomination for president, a new poll released Tuesday shows, and she tops a slate of potential Republican White House hopefuls.

Clinton, who has not yet said whether she will run for president, is supported by 58 percent of Democrats in a hypothetical primary against Sen. Elizabeth Warren (Mass.) (11 percent); Vice President Biden (9 percent); New York Gov. Andrew Cuomo (4 percent); Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley (1 percent); and former Montana governor Brian Schweitzer (1 percent). Quinnipiac University conducted the national survey.

Unlike the prospective Democratic race, the prospective Republican field has no clear frontrunner. Four Republicans register double-digit support: Sen. Rand Paul (Ky.) (11 percent); former Florida governor Jeb Bush (10 percent); New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie (10 percent); and former Arkansas governor Mike Huckabee (10 percent). Twenty percent of Republicans say they are undecided.

Coming in behind the four leading contenders: Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker (8 percent); Rep. Paul Ryan (Wis.) (8 percent); Sen. Ted Cruz (Tex.) (8 percent); Sen. Marco Rubio (Fla.) (6 percent); Texas Gov. Rick Perry (3 percent); former senator Rick Santorum (Pa.) (2 percent); Ohio Gov. John Kasich (2 percent); and Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal (1 percent).

Clinton was tested in hypothetical general election match-ups against against Christie, Paul, Huckabee, Bush and Ryan. She bests all five by between seven and nine points.

The poll was conducted from June 24-30.

Politico: "Cleveland to host 2016 GOP convention"

By Katie Glueck and Maggie Haberman

July 8, 2014, 11:57 a.m. EDT

Cleveland will host the 2016 Republican National Convention after beating out Dallas for the final nod, putting the party's nomination festivities in a key presidential battleground, chairman Reince Priebus said Tuesday.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Priebus made the announcement on Fox News and an official statement followed.

In choosing Cleveland, party organizers opted for a Democratic enclave in the pivotal battleground state of Ohio over the wealthier and more conservative Dallas area for their convention, which officials have indicated could take place in late June or mid-July of 2016.

Republican officials wanted an earlier convention in 2016, to allow the nominee to pivot more quickly to the general election. Cleveland offered up a late June date, while Dallas was considering mid-July, reports said, though an RNC spokeswoman said Tuesday that the exact timing was still part of the negotiation process.

“The RNC set a new standard for conventions during this process,” Priebus said in a statement. “Not only will the convention be held earlier in 2016, but there are also substantial guarantees in place for funding that put us well ahead of previous conventions and will give our nominee the best opportunity to succeed.”

GOP officials have said that logistics—including fundraising capabilities and hotel space—played a central role throughout the elimination process of a contest that previously also included Kansas City and Denver, among other cities.

Some Republican donors privately said Texas, where the Republican party recently made strong stands in its platform against gay rights, would send the wrong message at a time when the GOP needs to expand its base.

A critical component of the RNC’s “autopsy” after the 2012 election was the need to appeal to an increasingly diverse electorate. Holding the convention in a heavily African-American city provides a backdrop that helps the party avoid the appearance of homogeneity.

But there are downsides to holding the event in Ohio instead of Texas. There are fewer mega-donors in the Midwestern state, meaning the RNC needs money commitments ahead of time.

The event, which could draw up to 50,000 people, is expected to be prohibitively expensive. Cleveland, home to a new convention center, reportedly has $30 million on hand to $50 million in commitments that Dallas had secured. Ohioans involved in the effort, however, have said fundraising won’t be a problem.

The announcement is a coup for Cleveland as it seeks to remake itself from a crime-ridden, economically struggling Rust Belt city long dubbed the“Mistake on the Lake” to a thriving metropolis with a revitalized downtown.

The 2016 conventions won’t receive federal matching of funds as they had in the past. At the same time, such events are often economic boons for the host cities.

“It’s a unique opportunity to showcase the new Cleveland as one of America’s great cities, and to bring dollars and jobs to Ohio,” said Sen. Rob Portman (R-Ohio), a close ally of 2012 GOP nominee Mitt Romney.

The decision to go with Ohio was anticipated by many Republican operatives and donors.

Ohio is a crucial battleground that Republicans haven’t won in the last two elections. Obama’s turnout operation was critical to his win there in 2012, and Republicans are aware they need it back in their column if they’re going to succeed in the future.

Both Cleveland and Dallas turned to athletes, celebrities, fine dining—and in the case of Dallas, elephants that greeted officials —to make their cases to site selection decision-makers.

Cleveland had also been in the running to host the Democratic convention, though signing a contract to host the RNC would disqualify it from the DNC’s convention cities list.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The 2012 convention was held in Tampa, Florida, a choice that was roundly denounced after the fact, given that the city was in the path of a hurricane just as the convention was set to kick off. Organizers were forced to call off the first night of events, which led to a truncated and muted affair.

Hillary Clinton asked to be removed from a 1975 rape case in which her client was accused of sexually assaulting a 12-year-old girl, the onetime Arkansas lawyer said recently, addressing for the first time fresh retrospective reproach for her defense of a man she's suggested was guilty.

"When I was a 27-year-old attorney doing legal aid work at the [University of Arkansas] where I taught in Fayetteville, Arkansas, I was appointed by the local judge to represent a criminal defendant accused of rape," she said when broached with the topic in an interview with British online network Mumsnet. "I asked to be relieved of that responsibility, but I was not. And I had a professional duty to represent my client to the best of my ability, which I did."

The Washington Free Beacon recently obtained audio from a 1980s interview with Clinton in which she concedes some admittedly disquieting information about how she was able to seize on loopholes to minimize the sentence of the suspect, 41-year-old Thomas Alfred Taylor. Though he faced 30 years to life in prison, Clinton negotiated a plea deal that sentenced him to just one year in county jail and four years of probation.

In a sworn affidavit aiming to coerce a psychiatric evaluation of the sixth-grade victim, Clinton during the case nearly 40 years ago called into question the girl's emotional stability, arguing she had exhibited "a tendency to seek out older men and engage in... fantasizing." She added, citing a child psychology expert that "children in early adolescence tend to exaggerate or romanticize sexual experiences and that adolescents with disorganized families, such as the complainant, are even more prone to such behavior."

But in the recording, Clinton indicated she believed her client was indeed guilty. Heard laughing, she said the polygraph test he managed to pass "forever destroyed my faith in polygraphs."

Grasping to cast Clinton - the early frontrunner for the 2016 Democratic presidential nomination - as someone far removed from the champion of women's rights around which she's molded her reputation as first lady, senator and secretary of state, some Republicans have rallied attention back to her handling of the case.

Todd Akin, whose 2012 Senate campaign was largely annihilated by his theory that women who are victims of "legitimate rape" shouldn't be exempted from anti-abortion laws because they're unlikely to become pregnant, last month lambasted as "incredibly hypocritical" Clinton's defense of a child rapist "she knew to be guilty." He added that by laughing while discussing the case, Clinton "de-legitimized the legitimate claims of the 12-year-old victim," and that she "slandered the victim to justify her tactics."

Clinton stood by her defense during her interview with Mumsnet: "When you're a lawyer you often don't have the choice as to who you will represent," she said. "And by the very nature of criminal law there will be those you represent you don't approve of. But, at least in our system, you have an obligation. And once I was appointed I fulfilled that obligation."

Arkansas Times blog: Arkansas Blog: "Hillary: Did her duty in 1975 rape case defense"

By Max Brantley

July 8, 2014, 8:50 a.m.

The vast right-wing conspiracy has succeeded in reopening mainstream media discussion of Hillary Clinton's role as a court-appointed lawyer in defense of a man accused of raping a 12-year-old in Fayetteville 39 years ago. She plea-bargained a short sentence for the man.

She's given her first interview on the topic this year — the issue was plumbed in some depth in her 2008 presidential campaign and the elements of her response already were clear. But, she told Mumsnet, a British website, as reported in the New York Times:

"I asked to be relieved of that responsibility, but I was not, and I had a professional duty to represent my client to the best of my ability, which I did."

The victim in the case, who didn't criticize Clinton when interviewed in 2008, has said in an interview this year that Clinton took her through hell. Regrettably, challenging a victim's credibility is part of the job of being a defense lawyer. It is hard on the victim, but it is the lawyer's obligation. A defendant, even an obviously heinous one, is constitutionally entitled to a legal defense. But, as several articles have noted recently (and it was an issue in a recent Arkansas Supreme Court case), acting as a defense lawyer has become a ripe source of political opponent attacks, ethical obligation or no.

Earlier reporting by Michael Cook supported Clinton's statement that she didn't want to represent the defendant but had no choice. He demanded a female attorney. She was one of a very few female lawyers in Washington County at the time. The judge refused to release her from the appointment, the prosecutor said.

Der Spiegel (German Magazine): "Interview with Hillary Clinton: 'Surveillance on Merkel's Phone Was Absolutely Wrong'"

By Marc Hujer and Holger Stark

July 8, 2014, 11:34 a.m.

In an interview, Hillary Clinton discusses the growing gap between the rich and poor that threatens democracy, Americans' discontent with politics, her regrets over NSA spying on Chancellor Merkel's mobile phone and her potential presidential candidacy.

SPIEGEL: Madame Secretary, you've been in politics for over three decades. During that time, discontent with politics has increased considerably. Do you think expectations have become unrealistic?

Clinton: I think about this question a lot because we are putting an enormous amount of weight on one individual in our political system. In our country, we don't have a head of state and a head of government. We have one person: the president. That person has to fulfill the role of being the symbol of the country plus running the government. It is hard for anybody to carry that off. I think we're having a time in our history right now where people are disappointed in the political system, turned off by the political system, giving up on it or are wanting to hijack it with some ideological perspective. Therefore we need to enlist not just one person but kind of a consensus of leadership and citizenship to address that.

SPIEGEL: American society is polarized as never before. The French economist Thomas Piketty wrote a bestseller "Capital in the Twenty First Century" which is making a lot of noise right now. Have you had the chance to read it?

Clinton: I haven't read it yet. I've read very long essays about it and know what his principal point is. I think he makes a very strong case that we have unbalanced our economy too much towards favoring capital and away from labor. And I agree with his principal concern, which is that we have devalued labor. He talks about Europe, but it is the same thing in the United States.

SPIEGEL: Piketty argues that the growing gap between the rich and the poor is threatening democracy.

Clinton: I do agree with that. We've had this huge experiment known as America that was a diversity of populations, and we have held it together because we had a democracy that slowly over time included everybody. Even during the Great Depression people in the streets believed that they could make it and they would be better off. Now the relative wealth is much higher, but the disparity makes people believe that they're stuck. They no longer believe that things are going to get any better, no matter how hard they work. People have lost trust in each other and the political system and I think that's very threatening to democracy.

SPIEGEL: The average annual income of an American household is $22,296 (€16,397). You earn up to $200,000 an hour for a speech. Can you understand if people are bothered by that?

Clinton: Well, certainly, I can understand that, but that's never been the crux of the concern in our country, because we've always had people who did better than other people. That's just accepted. The problem is that people on the bottom and people in the middle class no longer feel like they have the opportunity to do better. The question is, how do we get back to having an economy that works for everybody and that once again gives people the optimism that they too will be successful.

SPIEGEL: According to your description of the United States, you should actually be applauded for your prosperity.

Clinton: Well, I think that if you go back and look at the last eight to 10 months, you'll see that people are seizing everything about me, and I accept that. I mean, that's part of being out in the public, out as a potential candidate, although I haven't made a decision.

SPIEGEL: You recently described your financial situation during the presidency of your husband Bill Clinton as dead broke.

Clinton: Well, when we came out of the White House, we were deeply in debt because of all the legal bills that we owed because of the relentless persecution of my husband and myself, and he had to work unbelievably hard to pay off every single penny of every debt we owed. And we did.

SPIEGEL: Today, you are multimillionaires. Your husband has earned $104 million with his speeches since 2001.

Clinton: We are very grateful for where we are today. But if you were to go back and look at the amount of money that we owed, we couldn't even get a mortgage on a house by ourselves. In our system he had to make double what he needed in order just to pay off the debt, and then to finance a house and continue to pay for our daughter's education.

Hillary Clinton on the possibility she will run for president again: "I haven't made up my mind."

SPIEGEL: Do you think it's a good system when you have to take such great personal and financial risks just in order to have a chance as a presidential candidate?

Clinton: Well, I don't think it is for me today. People running for president and even holding office are subjected to a full range of all kinds of attacks. If you want to be in politics in our country today, you go in with your eyes wide open about the potential price that you and your family might pay, and that's why you have to be very, very sure you not only want to do the job, but that you know what you want to do with the job, and you can deliver on that. Look at the recent Presidents: my husband, George W. Bush, Barack Obama. It's an incredibly stressful job. It ages a person. It takes a very thick skin to be able to do this job.

SPIEGEL: This all sounds like a vehement plea for your retirement.

Clinton: (Laughs) Well, I haven't made up my mind.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

SPIEGEL: If you should decide to run for the presidency in 2016, your opponent could be Jeb Bush and he could quite possibly be the third Bush in the White House. Even his mother Barbara Bush has declared that she does not think it is a good idea. Do you agree?

Clinton: I think the point she was making is understandable, but I also think in our democracy, anybody can run for any reason. And his last name may factor into it. The color of his eyes might factor into it. His policies, I hope, factor into it.

SPIEGEL: A majority of people is glad that the Bush era is finally over. What kind of message would that send?

Clinton: Well, there will be plenty of time to comment on that if indeed an election were to involve somebody with that last name, but I am not going to say anything about it now.

SPIEGEL: For the past 25 years, there were two families that were very prominent in politics, your family and the Bush family. First George Bush was president for four years, then your husband led the country for eight years, and then George W. Bush was president for eight years. If either you or Jeb Bush were to win the election in 2016, once again a member of these two families would become president. Will the American democracy turn into a monarchy?

Clinton: We had two Roosevelts. We had two Adams. It may be that certain families just have a sense of commitment or even a predisposition to want to be in politics. I ran for president, as you remember. I lost to somebody named Barack Obama, so I don't think there is any guarantee in American politics. My last name did not help me in the end. Our system is open to everyone. It is not a monarchy in which I wake up in the morning and abdicate in favor of my son.

SPIEGEL: Would you like to see your daughter in politics?

Clinton: It is really up to her, and I'll support her in whatever she chooses.

Hillary Clinton on NSA whistleblower Edward Snowden: "He is a poor messenger."

SPIEGEL: We want to throw a couple of names out there and you tell us the first thought that comes to mind. Neymar, the Brazilian?

Clinton: Oh. Well, is he the one who got injured? How tragic that he'd be out when Brazil will be playing Germany. I watched some of the replay to try to see exactly what happened. It is a serious injury. I hope he comes back full speed. He's a great player.

SPIEGEL: Jürgen Klinsmann, the American national coach.

Clinton: I think he made some very shrewd decisions in his choice of who is on the team. But I think he proved to be a very effective coach, and his coaching brought out the best in the players that he chose, and it helped to finally, I think, put what we call soccer and you call football on the map in the United States. So I give him a lot of credit for that.

SPIEGEL: Edward Snowden.

Clinton: You know, I think he is a poor messenger for the message that he's trying to take credit for. He came into the National Security Agency apparently with the purpose of trying to gather a lot of information, and most of what he gathered had nothing to do with surveillance in the United States, but obviously around the world. And I think he could have provoked the debate in our country without stealing and distributing material that was government property and was of some consequence. And then for him to go first to China and then to Russia raises a lot of questions, but he is going to have to make his own choices. If he returns to the United States, he will certainly stand trial, but he will have an opportunity to speak out and to make his case in both a legal way and a public fashion.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

SPIEGEL: We actually wanted to talk about your book and not about the NSA, but since it became known on Fridaythat a member of the German intelligence agency was arrested who had admitted that he acted as a spy for a US intelligence service, the issue of the NSA has gained a new dimension. Given the tense political climate, do you believe the CIA could seriously come up with idea of infiltrating German intelligence?

Clinton: Well, I know that your government is conducting a criminal investigation, and we will learn more as the facts are developed. And I know nothing other than what I read. But clearly, we have to do a much better job in working together between Germany and the United States to sort out what the appropriate lines of cooperation are on intelligence and security. I think the cooperation is necessary for our security, but we don't want to undermine it by raising doubts again and again. Clearly, the surveillance on Chancellor Merkel's phone was absolutely wrong. The president said that. I think that he made it very clear it was unacceptable. Where are the lines on both sides? That's what we have to work out.

SPIEGEL: Would you agree that acquiring a source within the German intelligence agency should be taboo for US intelligence services?

Clinton: I don't want to give a general answer. There's so much that goes on in intelligence circles. If we were to say no, under no circumstances, that you shouldn't do that to us, we shouldn't do that to you, what if a circumstance arises where it is conceivable that it would be in your interest and ours? The United States could never enter into a No-Spy agreement with any country -- not you, not Britain, not Canada. But that doesn't mean that within the intelligence and security institutions within our two countries, we shouldn't have a much clearer idea of what is appropriate and what should not be done.

SPIEGEL: Do you think Angela Merkel deserves an apology?

Clinton: Well, it is my understanding that the president and she have talked numerous times.

SPIEGEL: Yes, but no public apology.

Clinton: I'm not in the government anymore, but I'm sorry.

Politico: "Hillary Clinton: Thomas Piketty right on labor"

By Maggie Haberman

July 8, 2014, 12:06 p.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton says she hasn't yet read Thomas Piketty's bestselling book on income inequality, but that she's familiar with the gist and agrees that "we have devalued labor."

The potential 2016 presidential contender, in an interview with Germany's Der Spiegel, also said she "can understand" people being bothered by her high speaking fees, "but that's never been the crux of the concern in our country, because we've always had people who did better than other people. That's just accepted."

Clinton's comments this week came as she travels in Europe to promote "Hard Choices," her memoir about her time as secretary of state.

The Piketty book has received attention as debate grows in the U.S. over how to deal with income inequality, an issue that has been driving economic policy discussions in the Democratic Party.

Asked by the interviewer if she's read Piketty's "Capital in the Twenty-First Century," Clinton replied: "I haven't read it yet. I've read very long essays about it and know what his principal point is. I think he makes a very strong case that we have unbalanced our economy too much towards favoring capital and away from labor."

She added: "And I agree with his principal concern, which is that we have devalued labor. He talks about Europe, but it is the same thing in the United States."

The current "disparity makes people believe that they're stuck," Clinton said. "They no longer believe that things are going to get any better, no matter how hard they work. People have lost trust in each other and the political system and I think that's very threatening to democracy."

With regard to her own income from speaking fees, which can be upwards of $200,000 per speech, Clinton said: "The problem is that people on the bottom and people in the middle class no longer feel like they have the opportunity to do better. The question is, how do we get back to having an economy that works for everybody and that once again gives people the optimism that they too will be successful."

Clinton also was asked about her much-criticized earlier comments about being "dead broke" when she and former President Bill Clinton left the White House.

"When we came out of the White House, we were deeply in debt because of all the legal bills that we owed because of the relentless persecution of my husband and myself," she said. "And he had to work unbelievably hard to pay off every single penny of every debt we owed."

Politico: "Hillary Clinton on dynasties: We had 2 Roosevelts"

By Jonathan Topaz

July 8, 2014, 9:41 a.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton on Tuesday defended her family and the Bushes, saying that U.S. politics has a history of political families but that the country is not a "monarchy."

In an interview with Germany's Der Spiegel, Clinton was asked whether the U.S. is at risk of becoming a monarchy if she or former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush wins the presidency in 2016.

"We had two Roosevelts. We had two Adams," the former secretary of State said, invoking two of the most powerful political families in U.S. history. "It may be that certain families just have a sense of commitment or even a predisposition to want to be in politics."

John Quincy Adams, the sixth U.S. president, was the son of John Adams, the country's second president. Former Presidents Theodore and Franklin Delano Roosevelt were distant cousins.

Some political commentators have suggested that a potential matchup between Jeb Bush and Hillary Clinton would make the U.S. politics feel dynastic, given those families' relative dominance over American politics over the past 25 years.

In the interview Tuesday, Clinton said that her defeat in the 2008 Democratic primary to then-Sen. Barack Obama signifies that name recognition isn't enough to succeed in American politics.

"I ran for president, as you remember," she said. "I lost to somebody named Barack Obama, so I don't think there is any guarantee in American politics. My last name did not help me in the end. Our system is open to everyone. It is not a monarchy in which I wake up in the morning and abdicate in favor of my son."

Former First Lady Barbara Bush, Jeb's mother, said in January that she hoped her son wouldn't run and that politicians from other families should lead the country.

"I think this is a great American country, great country, and if we can't find more than two or three families to run for high office, that's silly, because there are great governors and great eligible people to run," she said.

A Quinnipiac University poll released Tuesday morning showed Clinton as the clear frontrunner among 2016 Democratic presidential contenders. Bush was tied for second in the survey of Republican voters, trailing Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul by one point.

Clinton, who says she is still mulling over whether to run for president, told Der Spiegel that she will support her daughter Chelsea whether she chooses to become involved in politics or not.

Huffington Post: "Ready For Hillary Starts Spreading Its Money Around To Key States"

By Amanda Terkel

July 8, 2014, 11:38 a.m. EDT

WASHINGTON -- Ready for Hillary, the organization setting the stage for Hillary Clinton to run for president in 2016, has strategically distributed more than $175,000 to 33 state Democratic parties and national Democratic organizations.

On May 28, Ready for Hillary shifted from being a super PAC to what's known as a "hybrid PAC." With the new designation, the group can contribute directly to federal candidates while still making unlimited expenditures like a super PAC (provided it's not coordinating with campaigns).

According to a list shared shared exclusively with The Huffington Post, Ready for Hillary has given money to 27 state Democratic parties and six national organizations since its shift:

Alaska Democratic Party

Arkansas Democratic Party

Colorado Democratic Party

Delaware Democratic Party

Florida Democratic Party

Democratic Party of Georgia

Idaho Democratic Party

Indiana Democratic Party

Iowa Democratic Party

Kentucky Democratic Party

"Making these direct financial contributions allows Ready for Hillary to further our mission by boosting grassroots efforts across the country to elect Democrats in 2014 and beyond," a Ready for Hillary official said in an email. "This is our initial set of contributions, and we will provide additional financial support in the coming months while continuing to channel the enthusiasm of our more than two million grassroots supporters to help Democrats come out on top this Fall."

Notably, the four early presidential primary states -- Iowa, New Hampshire, Nevada and South Carolina -- are receiving funds from the group, as are all the states with major Senate races.

Since Ready for Hillary formed, it has spent more than $5.7 million total, according to the Center for Responsive Politics. It has also rented the list of supporters from Clinton's 2008 presidential run and continued to build on it through fundraising appeals and events around the country -- an asset if Clinton does decide to jump into the field for 2016.

Ready for Hillary is also helping to sponsor Democratic events and conventions -- often coinciding with a financial contribution to a state Democratic Party -- while holding community events and its Ready for Hillary Grassroots Tour. The group's prominent bus has been going around the country, following Clinton as she promotes her new memoir.

The group has also attracted some high-profile supporters who want Clinton to run, such as Sens. Tim Kaine (D-Va.) and Claire McCaskill (D-Mo.).

Washington Post blog: Post Politics: "Hillary Clinton 'sorry' that Merkel's phone was tapped"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By Sean Sullivan

July 8, 2014, 11:29 a.m. EDT

Former secretary of state Hillary Rodham Clinton said in an interview published Tuesday that it was wrong for U.S. intelligence officials to spy on German Chancellor Angela Merkel's cellphone and said she is "sorry" that it happened.

"Clearly, the surveillance on Chancellor Merkel's phone was absolutely wrong. The president said that. I think that he made it very clear it was unacceptable," Clinton told Germany's Der Spiegel news magazine. She added, "I'm not in the government anymore, but I'm sorry."

In the interview, Clinton rejected the notion that the American political process is beginning to resemble a monarchy, given the dominance of her family and the Bush family. She also defended the money she and Bill Clinton have made over the years, signaled openness to daughter Chelsea Clinton entering politics and criticized former National Security Agency contractor Edward Snowden.

"We are very grateful for where we are today. But if you were to go back and look at the amount of money that we owed, we couldn't even get a mortgage on a house by ourselves. In our system, he had to make double what he needed in order just to pay off the debt, and then to finance a house and continue to pay for our daughter's education," Clinton said in a discussion about her family's finances.

When asked about dynasties, Clinton said: "We had two Roosevelts. We had two Adams. It may be that certain families just have a sense of commitment or even a predisposition to want to be in politics. I ran for president, as you remember. I lost to somebody named Barack Obama, so I don't think there is any guarantee in American politics. My last name did not help me in the end. Our system is open to everyone. It is not a monarchy in which I wake up in the morning and abdicate in favor of my son."

Clinton said Snowden has fallen short with his attempt to raise the issue of domestic surveillance among the American people.

"I think he is a poor messenger for the message that he's trying to take credit for," she said. "He came into the National Security Agency apparently with the purpose of trying to gather a lot of information, and most of what he gathered had nothing to do with surveillance in the United States, but obviously around the world."

National Journal: "If Hillary Clinton Doesn't Run, Who Would Lead the Democratic Field for President?"

By Matt Vasilogambros

July 8, 2014

[Subtitle:] Other potential Democratic candidates like Elizabeth Warren and Andrew Cuomo are largely unknown among potential voters, according to a new poll.

Hillary Clinton is almost certainly going to run for president. But what if she doesn't, and the Democratic field winds up wide open?

If she chooses not to run, leaving the Democratic nomination for president up for the taking, Democrats would be in actual disarray, according to a new Quinnipiac poll released Tuesday.

Right now, Clinton leads in the potential Democratic field with 58 percent, topping Sen. Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts (11 percent), Vice President Joe Biden (9 percent) and New York Gov. Andrew Cuomo (4 percent). Democrats clearly expect Clinton will make a run for president, and they would generally support her candidacy if it happens.

Clinton's lead is much larger than it was at this point in 2006—after which she would eventually lose the nomination to a little-known senator from Illinois. In a June 2006 Gallup Poll, she led with 37 percent among Democrats in a theoretical 2008 matchup, followed by former Vice President Al Gore at 16 percent, former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina at 13 percent, and Secretary of State John Kerry at 12 percent.

But if you take Clinton out of the picture for 2016, the rest of the field consists of candidates whom Democrats either don't want or don't know.

Take Joe Biden. The vice president holds a strong 73 percent favorability rating among Democrats, but, clearly, Democrats prefer other people to him for the presidency. Biden is behind Warren in this latest poll by a couple of percentage points, and far behind Clinton.

While several Democrats have higher favorable than unfavorable ratings, the percentage of people who haven't heard enough about them is much higher—50 percent for Cuomo, 88 percent for Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, 53 percent for Warren, and 88 percent for former Montana Gov. Brian Schweitzer, according to this poll.

If Clinton didn't run, Democrats wouldn't know enough about the rest of the theoretical field to have a clear front-runner.

Now, this all being said, Barack Obama was almost nowhere to be found at this point in the election cycle in 2006. He managed to get the support of only 1 percent of all voters when they were asked in June 2006 whom they would most like to see elected president in 2008. Obama didn't start hinting he would run for president until later in the summer.

People didn't know much about Obama, but it worked out for him just fine. It could work out for another Democrat, too.

Washington Free Beacon: "MSNBC Slams Hillary Clinton Over Rape Tapes"

By Washington Free Beacon Staff

July 8, 2014, 9:01 a.m. EDT

An MSNBC panel slammed Hillary Clinton over the tapes uncovered by the Washington Free Beacon which record her laughing about freeing a child rapist, calling her behavior "jarring" and "disturbing."

"She sounded boastful," noted Joe Scarborough. "She sounded boastful on the tape that she was able to get this 41-year-old guy who raped a young girl, a minor girl, and get him off and was laughing about the evidence, laughing about the lie detector test, laughing about a lot of it. It's disturbing to say the least, isn't it?"

The Huffington Post's Sam Stein agreed, "Yeah, the boastfulness in the audiotape is certainly disturbing and, you know, whereas she could have sounded regretful about the circumstances of the case and the outcome but still admitted this was her job and she fulfilled it."

Mika Brzezinski asked, "From the boastful tone, is that a problem for Hillary Clinton, being dismissive of a young girl who was abused sexually?"

Bloomberg's Mark Halperin replied, "I think it's a little bit off key given what her campaign will be about."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Halperin also speculated that this story shows that the American public may know less about Clinton than they think they do: “We think we know everything about her? This story and others that have come out in the last few months show there’s lots more to come.”

Scarborough added that, while he was an attorney and knows many attorneys, he has never heard anyone discuss defending a child rapist in the flippant manner Clinton displays in the tape. “That is jarring,” he said. ”I’m not sure why she is bragging about getting a child rapist two months.”

Al Sharpton concurred with the other panelists, observing, “It clearly is not the kind of situation that she wants to have to defend when you’re hearing your own voice taking lightly something that speaks to one of your core issues, and that is the value of women.”

Subject: What to Do about ISIS

Tikkun { tē-kün } to heal, repair, and transform the world

Editor's Note: Tikkun seeks to present a range of views that you wouldn't hear in the mainstream media, without necessarily endorsing those perspectives. Please remember that Tikkun's own position is articulated only in our editorials.

In my view, the important article by David Swanson that I'm sharing below may be underestimating the venality and murderous nature of the ISIS coalition that he describes. Unlike Hamas and unlike the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt, ISIS appears to have genocidal intent toward Christians and Shia Muslims (and possibly also toward Sunnis who don't share their perspective and almost certainly toward Jews).

On the other hand, I know that I don't know who they really are or even what they are really doing. I've read enough lies about previous run-up to wars in the Western media to know not to believe anything I read, but only to consider that the media's account is one possible way of viewing the reality.

I also know that the gruesome accounts of murders committed by ISIS are shocking to a U.S. audience in part because the far greater number of people killed by the U.S. interventions in the Middle East, South East Asia, Central and South America have never been presented in an honest way to the American people. Most of us have not heard the gruesome details or stories of the families that have lost loved ones as a result of U.S. military and CIA actions.

Accounts of how ISIS members used waterboarding on their captives have been told in a way that dramatizes the inhumanity of a tactic that was used on many, many of those held by the United States in Guantanamo and in more secret detention and torture facilities run by or contacted by the United States around the world.

Yet U.S. feelings of rage about waterboarding were never directed at those who perpetrated and those who approved that torture, so people like George W. Bush and former vice president Cheney and the many under them in the chain of command who carried out these outrageous acts have never been brought to trial.

When it's ISIS that commits these abuses, we are encouraged to think of their actions as reasons for war; when it's our U.S. leaders who commit the same abuses, we don't even think it sufficient reason to put them in prison!

On the other hand, my outrage at acts that we in the U.S. have committed does not diminish my outrage at what ISIS is doing, if the media accounts are even partially correct, and my desire to want to stop them before more people are murdered. But how? Not in a way that will have even worse consequences, in the way that the U.S. ouster of Saddam Hussein's (who should have spent the rest of his life in prison) led to the growth of ISIS.

Our inclination always at Tikkun is to ask the following question of any group espousing hateful ideas (including haters among Christian, Jewish, Muslim, Hindu, and Buddhist fundamentalist movements; followers of secular right-wing or fascist groups; and those who adhere to the ultra-nationalistic, ultra-militaristic tendencies within American and Israeli nationalism, as well as any other kind of nationalism): What are the underlying needs that these movements are speaking to that might be legitimate needs of the people who respond to them? And how do we then develop strategies to separate those legitimate needs from the fascistic, racist, or irrational ways that people seek to meet those needs through these hateful and sometimes violent movements?

These are the questions that I've answered in some detail in my books The Politics of Meaning, Spirit Matters, and The Left Hand of God: Taking Back our Country from the Religious Right. The goal is not to excuse outrageous and murderous acts, but to figure out how to disempower the murderers, whether they be American, Iraqi, Chinese, Russian, Israeli, or from Hamas. The goal is to ensure that their followers don't move on to some other equally terrible movement or murderous sect or religion or nationalism once these particular murderers are gone.

If you read those books you'll see why I'm inclined to think that Swanson is moving in a good direction but lacks some of the psychological and spiritual tools necessary to make his strategy successful. One of those tools is a Global Marshall Plan (please download it at tikkun.org/GMP and read the full 32-page brochure). The problem with mentioning the GMP is that people immediately think it's primarily about giving money. But it's not. It is predicated on a strategy of showing respect and genuine caring for the well-being of all people on the planet. This caring would be conveyed partly through money, but more importantly through a fundamental transformation brought about by the Western world in adopting the New Bottom Line laid out in detail at tikkun.org/covenant .

Without that approach, the United States will have no tools for dealing with ISIS, and so inevitably the people of this country will fall back onto violence and war making.

"Fine," you may say, "but what are we supposed to do NOW? Don't you realize that these people are a real menace?" That may be true, but the reason it's true is because people always go to that formulation—the one that led us into a war to overthrow Saddam Hussein in the first place without having any idea of what could replace him. Without that alternative, Swanson's point is that we created the preconditions for the rise of ISIS.

So, truth is, I don't know what we should do with ISIS in the short run, except to follow some of the steps that Swanson proposes, other steps that are defined in the Global Marshall Plan and in the Network of Spiritual Progressives' Spiritual Covenant at spiritualprogressives.org , and yet others that I'll propose in a subsequent article within the next few weeks.

While these steps may not be sufficient, I know for sure that taking any other path that doesn't also include these steps is bound to simply recreate the set of circumstances that have led us into the current mess. The one thing I'm sure about: if some kind of intervention is justified, and I think it may be, it should be genuinely led by the United Nations and not by the United States. And it should not occur solely at the initiative of the United States.

If the people of the world are ready to take some action, let us follow their leadership rather than intervene alone—U.S. hands are, as they say in law, "dirty hands" and hence not able to provide ethically credible leadership. So please do read Swanson's insightful article. And then please also read David Sylvester's post on Tikkun Daily with its call for the Abrahamic religions to lead an international summit of religious forces to develop a response to the increasingly murderous realities we face.

Meanwhile, have a joyous Labor Day 2014! Wouldn't it be great if this year working people used this day off to figure out how to take back control of our country from the super-rich and powerful so that we too could participate in the discussions that the elite have about which wars to drag us into? Maybe next year?

What to Do About ISIS

by David Swanson

Originally published on warisacrime.org

Start by recognizing where ISIS came from. The U.S. and its junior partners destroyed Iraq, left a sectarian division, poverty, desperation, and an illegitimate government in Baghdad that did not represent Sunnis or other groups. Then the U.S. armed and trained ISIS and allied groups in Syria, while continuing to prop up the Baghdad government, providing Hellfire missiles with which to attack Iraqis in Fallujah and elsewhere.

ISIS has religious adherents but also opportunistic supporters who see it as the force resisting an unwanted rule from Baghdad and who increasingly see it as resisting the United States. It is in possession of U.S. weaponry provided directly to it in Syria and seized from the Iraqi government. At last count by the U.S. government, 79 percent of weapons transferred to Middle Eastern governments come from the United States, not counting transfers to groups like ISIS, and not counting weapons in the possession of the United States.

So, the first thing to do differently going forward: stop bombing nations into ruins, and stop shipping weapons into the area you've left in chaos. Libya is of course another example of the disasters that U.S. wars leave behind them—a war, by the way, with U.S. weapons used on both sides, and a war launched on the pretext of a claim well documented to have been false that Gaddafi was threatening to massacre civilians.

So, here's the next thing to do: be very skeptical of humanitarian claims. The U.S. bombing around Erbil to protect Kurdish and U.S. oil interests was initially justified as bombing to protect people on a mountain. But most of those people on the mountain were in no need of rescue, and that justification has now been set aside, just as Benghazi was. Recall also that Obama was forced to withdraw U.S. troops from Iraq when he couldn't get the Iraqi government to give them immunity for crimes they commit. He has now obtained that immunity and back in they go, the crimes preceding them in the form of 500-pound bombs.

While trying to rescue hostages and discovering an empty house, and racing to a mountain to save 30,000 people but finding 3,000 and most of those not wanting to leave, the U.S. claims to know exactly whom the 500-pound bombs are killing. But whomever they are killing, they are generating more enemies, and they are building support for ISIS, not diminishing it. So, now the U.S. finds itself on the opposite side of the war in Syria, so what does it do? Flip sides! Now the great moral imperative is not to bomb Assad but to bomb in defense of Assad, the only consistent point being that "something must be done" and the only conceivable something is to pick some party and bomb it.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But why is that the only conceivable thing to be done? I can think of some others:

1. Apologize for brutalizing the leader of ISIS in Abu Ghraib and to every other prisoner victimized under U.S. occupation.

2. Apologize for destroying the nation of Iraq and to every family there.

3. Begin making restitution by delivering aid (not "military aid" but actual aid, food, medicine) to the entire nation of Iraq.

4. Apologize for role in war in Syria.

5. Begin making restitution by delivering actual aid to Syria.

6. Announce a commitment not to provide weapons to Iraq or Syria or Israel or Jordan or Egypt or Bahrain or any other nation anywhere on earth and to begin withdrawing U.S. troops from foreign territories and seas, including Afghanistan. (The U.S. Coast Guard in the Persian Gulf has clearly forgotten where the coast of the U.S. is!)

7. Announce a commitment to invest heavily in solar, wind, and other green energy and to provide the same to democratic representative governments.

8. Begin providing Iran with free wind and solar technologies -- at much lower cost of course than what it is costing the U.S. and Israel to threaten Iran over a nonexistent nuclear weapons program.

9. End economic sanctions.

10. Send diplomats to Baghdad and Damascus to negotiate aid and to encourage serious reforms.

11. Send journalists, aid workers, peace workers, human shields, and negotiators into crisis zones, understanding that this means risking lives, but fewer lives than further militarization risks.

12. Empower people with agricultural assistance, education, cameras, and internet access.

13. Launch a communications campaign in the United States to replace military recruitment campaigns, focused on building sympathy and desire to serve as critical aid workers, persuading doctors and engineers to volunteer their time to travel to and visit these areas of crisis.

14. Work through the United Nations on all of this.

15. Sign the United States on to the International Criminal Court and voluntarily propose the prosecution of top U.S. officials of this and the preceding regimes for their crimes.

Subject: [big campaign] Tracking Update: McCain Town Hall in Sparks, NV 07/29/08

Hello All,
Just got off the phone with our tracker, Kelli, on the ground in Sparks, NV. Below are the notes from our call.

BIG HIGHLIGHTS:

- Asked if he would raise taxes, answers point-blank "No"
- Says CA drillers told him yesterday they could get offshore oil within a matter of months, so don't listen to these estimates of 5 years out, etc.
- Says Obama wants peace but he still opposes strategy that any rational person can see succeeded in Iraq
- Tells disabled woman about to lose her home that he supported ADA years ago and we need to update it
- Says he's also "a quote 'survivor' " of cancer, but it's been 8 years, gives mini "commercial" about wearing sunscreen etc.
- Tells woman the chances of her nephew surviving Afghanistan are good but he's putting himself in harm's way; we will soon have a "new strategy" in Afghanistan
- Says he "relish[es] being the underdog," Hits Obama on public financing
- Says he is a "proud conservative" but he believes government needs to "help people who can't help themselves"
- Cindy likens McCain to the Rwandan women she recently visited

Sparks, NV: McCain Town Hall 07/29/08
(Disclaimer: The following are notes, not direct quotes. If you'd like a quotable transcript or video of any part below, please email us.)

Background Details

- Approx. 1000 people (Mostly white middle age couples and students from the high school)

- Huge sign that says "Country First"
- Also in audience were ROTC members in dress uniforms - seated up front along with cheerleaders (presumably from high school)
- About 10 protesters after the event, including antiwar protesters and a Ron Paul supporter supporting GOP but not McCain
- Mayor of Sparks gives introductory remarks - tells crowd to expect a "secret guest speaker" (turns out to be Cindy McCain)
- Cindy introduces her husband
    - Last week I went to Rwanda with ONE.org. Rwanda is a country that is and will be taken into the future by women, after forgiving the perpetrators that raped them and left them for their dead. They want not only what's best for their children but what's best for their country.
    - I found a comparison - my husband was kept as a POW in Vietnam for 5 years, he suffered and overcame many things and then he reconciled with Vietnam. My husband embodies everything that is great about Americans. "My husband, like the Rwandan women" is the essence of hope and courage.

Speech Highlights
- TY to Cindy, I'm very proud of the work she's done around the world.
- 17 years ago, Cindy was doing good work with a medical team in Bangladesh at an orphanage run by Mother Teresa's nuns. Cindy brought 2 babies to USA, one of them had a severe cleft palate, and she is now our daughter, Bridget and she has enriched our lives.
- TY to Mary Vesco, principal at Reed High, TY to Gov. Brian Kilicky, to Mayors Gino Martini and Brian Kachell (former Reno mayor)
- Story about winning his Senate seat only to be called by a campaign aide about changing garbage days but she didn't want to bother the mayor because she didn't want to bother an important man like that. TY to mayors.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- This is the essence of democracy.
- I love this state. We in AZ are angry because you steal our water. I am grateful to visit a fellow western state that faces the same challenges of water, Native Americans, etc. I understand the issues. NV will be a swing state and I will win it.
- 1 more story- AZ is the only state where mothers don't tell their children that some day they can grow up and be POTUS. But I will be able to reverse that unhappy history.
- I'll make it quick because the purpose of the Townhall meeting is for me to listen to you. I would never be able to understand the issues important to you without these hundreds, maybe thousands, of town halls. Service to c
- I've been called a maverick, sometimes meant as compliment sometimes criticism. What it really means is understand who I work for: not a party, not a POTUS, a special interest, myself - I work for you.
- I spoke up against an administration for a strategy in Iraq that will allow us to bring our troops home in honor.
- I spoke up against my party for out-of-control spending.
- I spoke up against my Administration and both parties in Congress on the energy bill.
- My independence hasn't always made me friends in DC.
- I've had pundits adn politicians tell me this isn't smart, but I don't answer to them, I answer to you. Country first.
- We need to change the way government does business, from security to education to education to ATC. All these functions of govt were designed before the rise of the global economy.
- We have to change the way things are done.
- It's hard trying to do the Lord's work in satan's city.
- Obama is an impressive speaker, I applaud his success - everyone should be proud of his accomplishments. My problem is that what he says and what he does are 2 different things. He makes things harder. He says he wants to change DC but his solution is to make govt bigger. He's asked for millions in earmarks. Not me.
- Obama said he would only tax the rich, but pretty much anythign he can tax, he'll tax more. I will keep taxes low, not because I want to protect the rich but because it keeps jobs at home.
- Obama says he wants energy independence but he doesn't want nuclear, he doesn't want research in an electric car.
- Obama says the problem isn't that gas prices are too high but that they rose too fast. Gas prices may not matter to him, but they do to you.
- We ought to start with drilling offshore so we can bring down the cost of gas. We can do it.
- Nuclear power works.
- We are spending $700B to bad people with foreign oil dependence. We can get off of this.
- Sen Obama says he wants peace but even today he opposes the strategy that has succeeded in Iraq and will succeed in Afgh. No rational person can look at the on-the-ground situation in IRaq and say the surge hasn't succeeded. The last 5 brigades that were part of the surge are on their way home
- I want to thank them. How do you (Obama) do that and tell them great job but you lost?
- In war and peace, I've been an imperfect servant. But nothing ever mattered more to me than the honor of serving America and nothing ever will.
- If you elect me POTUS, I assure you I will always put country first. America wants that type of person. I will stand for you. And we will disagree from time to time.
- A long time ago far away in a POW camp in N Vietnam, I was offered an opportunity to return home early but it was against our code of conduct. A brave friend of mine, Everett Alvarez was there and he had been there first. It was a hard decision, but I put my country first.
- Asks vets to raise their hands so we can thank them. You are a constant motivation to me to do the right thing.
- Now we'll begin the part you really came for.

Question & Answer

- [woman has problem with microphone. McCain jokes that the microphone 'is brought to you by the Democratic National Committee'

- 1Q) I'm a 4th generation farmer. No one else will be a picker than Mexicans. Now we can't find enough of them. If not, I'm worried we won't get the food Americans need. It is happening. Farmers are going out of business.
    - MCCAIN: Agriculture is important. American farmers are the best in the world. What you're talking about is the failure on the part of Congress to get immigration reform, get border security, get a legit temporary worker program and solve the illegal immigration problem. The temp worker program would mean people can come to this country, work for a couple of years and then go back to their home country. That's different the process for citizenship, where they get a green card. This can be done legally not illegally.
    - Brings me to another problem. I was in Colombia and Mexico. The drug cartels are taking over Mexico. We've got to work with Calderon. This Mex President wants to take control of Mexico over the drug cartels. We have to secure our borders. Drugs are part of the problem, people coming over and killing Americans.
    - You have my sympathy, we need a temporary worker program.

- [WW2 vet yelling against idea of Mexicans needed to supply labor - advocated child labor instead]
    - MCCAIN: One of the things we can't do at town hall meetings is not yell or else we'll all be yelling at each other. I will come to you next.

- 2Q) I'm scared/horrified about our national debt. How the hell are we going to pay for it?
    - MCCAIN: I don't think that I'm scared. But Americans are not appreciative that we let spending get out of control and we mortgaged our futures. Congressional approval is down to 9% - how do you get lower than that? We Republicans, to our shame, let spending get out of control. With legislation like the Medicare Prescription Drug bill, which is a good bill but we didn't pay for it.
    - The 1st thing Ill do after I'm sworn in as POTUS is sit down with the Dems and say let's fix Social Security. For once we can put the country first and not mortgage a young man's future.

- 3Q) [WW2 vet that had been yelling] modify child labor laws to supply labor force we need (instead of Mexicans)
    - MCCAIN: I still think we need a child labor law that works.

- 4Q) I became disabled, which means I can't go back to teaching and I have 2 kids. I get $600 / month from SSI. My house that I've had for 15 years is going to go into re-foreclosure. How can you help?
    - MCCAIN: I am proud I was one of the key sponsors to ADA.
    - Americans w/ adn w/o disabilities are hurting with cost of gas, staying in their homes.
    - We've also got to look at ADA and update it to make sure it's able to do what it was supposed to do
    - In the short term, I'd be happy to look at your case personally and make sure you can provide for your children.
    - NV was one of the hardest hit by housing crisis. Make sure people can stay in their homes. My plan is to make sure you can get a FHA 30-year guaranteed loan at new value. When you decide to sell house, 1/3 of selling price each goes to govt, to lender and to you.
    - [McCain

- 5Q) [small girl asks question] If you're POTUS, will you raise our taxes?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- MCCAIN: No. And that's one of the big differences between me and Obama.
- Let me mention one of the key areas: capital gains. He wants to raise taxes on them. When he tells you he's only going to tax the rich, pay attention, some people are surprised to find themselves in that category.
- The worst thing in these tough economic times is to raise taxes and I won't do it.

- 6Q) I, too, am a cancer survivor. What would you do about stem cell research? We need the help.
  - MCCAIN: A few days ago, I attended LAnce Armstrong's Livestrong.
  - I support stem cell research - very tough decision - because I believe it can help America. There have been tremendous advances in skin cell research, which I hope will make this debate academic.
  - I'm also excited about the huge development that was the mapping of the human genome.
  - I also am a "survivor" but it's been 8 years. If you'll listen to a quick commercial from me: stay out of the sun, use sunscreen.
- FOLLOWUP: What are my nephew's chances of coming home from Afghanistan alive?
  - MCCAIN: His chances are good but he's going into harm's way to protect our freedom. It's important that we use the same strategy that succeeded in Iraq, something OBama fails to understand. He doesn't understand this is jsut a political position you can change your position on.
  - Narcotraffic problem in Afghanistan, command strucutre problem that i won't go into.
  - Petraeus is about to take on a greater role. We will soon have a new strategy in Afghanistan and we will succeed. Dont underestimate the evil of the Taliban.

- MCCAIN: I was on the USS Arisocany (?) - I flew off that carrier. It sunk.

- 7Q) What's it going to take to get Congress to release the ban on drilling?
  - MCCAIN: It's because we have a Congress that is not responsive to the will of the American people. When Bush announced he was lifting the ban, the price of oil went down. Yesterday I met with CA drillers and they said they could get oil within a matter of months because they are already right next to existing oil sources. So don't listen to these estimates of 5 years out.

- 8Q) I am a family-owned business owner. We have been importing from Belarus for 16 years, and now there are these sanctions. The DOS had no idea about the # of companies that are affected by this. They produce products for US Forest Service. How does your foreign policy with countries like Belarus-- will you take into account how it affects
  - MCCAIN: First, Obama opposes OCS drilling, nuclear power, gas tax holiday and all the things we need to do to become energy independent.
  - I have never been to Belarus - I tried to go once but Lukeshenko prevented me. All I know is that he's a brutal dictator. We have to stand up to dictators. Sometimes we have to be able to take a hit on our economy to stand up to this. I'm sorry, I'll see if we can ameliorate the effects on businesses. The most noble words ever written are that we are all created equal, all. One of the things I'm most proud of USA is that we stand up to dictators adn fight for people all over the world, not militarily.

- 9Q) You're ahead in most recent Gallup poll. Does that change anything?
  - MCCAIN: Frankly I'm surprised. I'm the underdog in this race. I'll need everyone of you to get out of there and vote etc. I relish being the underdog. I am taking public financing according to the law. Obama is the first since we passed campaign finance reform not to take it. He said he would if I would. He looked into the camera on the last debate with HRC and said he would call me up and work it out with me - I'm still waiting for the phone to ring. Hello? So it's about who's going to keep your word.

    - I'm happy about where we are in the polls.
    - I'm waiting for him to come join me. Maybe we can learn things from being together. I've almost ahd to resort to the gimmick of having an empty chair.

- 10Q) I'm a conservatives and I think a lot of us are voting against OBama more than for you.
    - MCCAIN: What do you disagree on? A: Gang of 14, ANWR, falling in with climate change crowd, campaign finance reform, etc.
    - MCCAIN: I stand up against my party when I disagree with them.
    - Gang of 14 preserved one of the fundamental operating principles of Senate. I am proud to have supported Justice Roberts. Obama is too ideological.
    - Climate change is real and we have to address it. Suppose I am wrong and we adapt all these green technologies and I'm wrong, all we've done is given our kids a cleaner planet. But what if I'm right? And USA is so great that we will be the best at producing green technologies. I believe it's the future of our economy. I want to build 45 nuclear power plants, creating 700k new jobs.
    - We have members of Congress residing in jail. I stood up against corruption.
    - I am proud to be a conservative. I try to follow the lead of Reagan. Also, it's healthy for us to disagree.

- 11Q) What are you going to do with our trade policies in regards to bringing our (manufacturing) jobs back to America?
    - MCCAIN: I believe in free trade. I also think there are places we have failed. I will open markets to our products. The great problem is we have failed to support the displaced worker. In OH, MI, etc. there are families who were hurting before the subprime lending crisis. Americans are hurting and we haven't even talked about health care and we should. We need to go to community colleges and retrain and educate. And if it's an older worker, I will supplement their income while they take a lower-paying job and get retrained.
    - Technology has been great to get people better jobs, but we've left people behind. And now on top of that, we've had these hard economic times. I am a proud conservative, but one of the key functions of government is to help the people who can't help themselves. I have plans for job retraining, for energy independence, etc etc, and I will do that without raising your taxes.
    - Social Security is going bankrupt, Medicare, job creation,etc. - fix it together, Dems and GOPs. I've reached across the aisle with Lieberman, Feingold, Kennedy. The message I get from these town halls is stop fighting with each other, put your country first.

- safeguarding our country from the impacts of climate change and reducing our oil dependence

- preventing those who want to keep us trapped in the energy economy of the past from distorting our political process.

Hi John-

Here's the policy background Trevor Houser sent over for the Ben Gemen interview. Policy memo attached and at the bottom in plain text. All printed for you in the office as well in case you're able to make it in.

Thanks,
Milia

Note From Trevor Houser:

"Not sure if comms gave John background, but the reporter has been asking about HRC's process for a climate and enviro policy. Jake and the team felt now was an appropriate time to work with Ben Geman on that story in an effort to:

1) underscore how seriously she takes these issues;
2) Climate and Environment are top priorities for the campaign; and
3) The campaign is leading a deliberate and thoughtful policy process that has sought input from a large number of experts and key stakeholders in the environment, clean energy, and conservation communities.

The one other thing I would flag for John is that if Ben asks whether we would support a permanent extension of the PTC/ ITC we need to hedge given out solar/renewable targets. Those imply a $10-$15 billion per year price tag by 2020 and $25-$35 billion per year by 2027 if extended at current levels. May need to call for "extending and improving" or something like that."

Secretary of State Record

As Secretary, Hillary fought hard to mobilize a global response to climate change. She immediately created the first high-level post at the State Department dedicated exclusively to climate diplomacy (the US Special Envoy for Climate Change)

She put climate squarely on the agenda during her first trip as Secretary to Beijing

Hillary worked to feature climate change in the annual US-China Strategic and Economic Dialogue meeting

She helped to hammer out the breakthrough that led to the Copenhagen Accord, which, among other things, was the first international agreement in which all of the major economies – including China – committed to reduce their greenhouse gas pollution.

In addition, she worked hard as Secretary to build new coalitions to combat emissions from methane and other super-pollutants that damage the climate, as well as to launch a clean cookstove initiative that is bringing not only health but climate benefits.

In pursuing these international agreements, and the leadership we are showing at home and abroad, the United States now has a much stronger hand to play in the upcoming negotiations in Paris.

Re: Energy, Climate and Environment Policy Platform

This memo provides a brief overview of our proposed energy, climate and environment policy platform. We have developed six major policy initiatives that together offer a comprehensive strategy for a) protecting American families from pollution, b) powering the economy of the future, c) delivering energy and climate security that lasts, and d) responsibly stewarding our country's natural bounty and beauty. We are finalizing separate white papers with more detail on each of the six initiatives.

Our platform is designed to make the US the clean energy superpower of the 21st century and a global leader in the fight against climate change, and to do so in a way that provides economic opportunity and security for all Americans. We will have half a billion solar panels installed across the country by 2020 and generate enough renewable energy to power every home in the country within 10 years. During that time we will reduce US oil consumption by 20% and partner with other countries bring global oil demand growth to a halt [note: this is a proposed target we haven't yet discussed as a group].

The next decade is critical if we are going to successfully transition to a clean energy economy, deliver security that lasts, and prevent catastrophic climate change. The following is an ambitious and achievable plan of attack.

1. Smart Standards

We will fight efforts to roll back environmental protections in favor of polluters. We will defend and extend common-sense standards that make our air and water cleaner, safeguard the health of our families, reduce energy waste, driven clean energy deployment and fight global climate change. This includes full implementation of the Clean Power Plan, extension of efficiency standards for cars, trucks, airplanes and appliances, better building codes, mandatory disclosure of fracking chemicals and methane regulations on oil and gas production.

2. Clean Energy Challenge

Standards set the floor, not the ceiling. We can and must go further. We will form a new partnership with states, cities and rural communities that are ready to lead, providing competitive grants to those that exceed federal guidelines, remove barriers to clean energy access and entrepreneurship, and invest in innovative solutions that reduce energy costs, protect public health and cut carbon pollution.

As part of this bargain, we will guarantee that every agency within the federal government is working in concert to ensure Americans have the tools and resources they need to succeed. That includes investing in new technologies, both in our labs and through our tax code, and ensuring that we are maximizing the clean energy potential of public lands and public buildings. We will expand successful innovation initiatives, like ARPA-e, cut those that fail to deliver results, and ensure that public R&D supports private sector entrepreneurialism, small business creation and employment growth.

3. Modernizing North American Infrastructure

We must improve the safety and security of existing energy infrastructure in North America and ensure that the new infrastructure we build is consistent with the clean energy economy we are seeking to create. We will launch a major initiative to repair, replace and better regulate our existing pipeline and rail network to protect our families, communities, and outdoor economy from the risk of oil spills and explosions and protect the climate from fugitive methane emissions. And we'll negotiate a North American Climate Compact with Canada and Mexico that guides future infrastructure investment on the continent through ambitious emission reduction commitments, coordinated policy action, and strong accountability mechanisms.

Security that Lasts

The recent growth in domestic oil and gas production provides important economic and geopolitical benefits, but it doesn't solve the energy-related security issues that have plagued our country for decades. US gasoline prices will continue to be set by the global market, no matter how much oil we produce, leaving our economy vulnerable to supply disruptions elsewhere in the world. In addition, the more oil and other fossil fuels we burn, the more risk we bear – both to our economy and our national security - from higher sea levels and increasingly devastating storms, heatwaves and droughts.

The only way to truly safeguard our country is to reduce the amount of oil consumed both at home and around the world and make our investments, our communities and our infrastructure more resilient to climate-related risks. We will take actions necessary to drive down oil consumption in the US, and will partner with other countries to halt the growth in global oil consumption within the next ten years. We will lead the world in combatting climate change, build resilient infrastructure and ensure American families, businesses and investors have actionable information on the kinds of risks they face.

Collaborative Stewardship

We are still developing the public lands/conservation leg of the platform, which will include the following components:

1. Royalty reform: Raise the on-shore oil and gas royalty rate on public lands to match that charged on private lands in Texas and other states and close the loophole in coal royalty policy that costs taxpayers hundreds of millions of dollars per year.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

2. Leasing: Take areas too sensitive for energy production, like the Arctic, off the table.

3. LWCF: Fully fund the Land and Water Conservation Fund

4. Outdoor economy: Support the growth of the outdoor economy by protecting national parks and forests and improving access to public lands for hunters and anglers and other types of recreation.

A Just Transition

As we build the energy economy of the 21st century, we cannot turn our backs on the workers and communities in the coalfields who kept the lights on and factories running during the 20th century. We will ensure that the retirement benefits of coal miners and their families are secure, invest in carbon capture, utilization and sequestration technology, and launch a major workforce and local economic development initiative for coalfield communities from Central Appalachia to the Powder River Basin.

We will also address the legacy costs fossil fuel combustion in communities disproportionately impacted by the resulting air pollution. We will provide block grants to states, cities and rural communities that develop innovative economic development and public health solutions for vulnerable communities as part of their clean energy strategy, such as the SB 535 program in California.

Subject: [big campaign] Tracking Update: McCain Town Hall in Rochester, NH 07/22/08

Hello All,
Just off the phone with our tracker Ryan who is on the ground today in Rochester. Below are the notes from our call.

BIG HIGHLIGHTS:

- McCain says the oil execs say we could see results from offshore drilling "within a couple of years"
- Says "Czechoslovakia" again, immediately corrects and explains himself
- Long back-and-forth on wrongful invasion of Iraq, McCain adamant about keeping it "respectful" (see 6Q)
- Expands on claim that we can apply strategy in Iraq to Afghanistan: also need a poppy plan and Pakistan-border strategy
- Praises Romney, Huckabee
- Says he's worried about Russia being aggressive in foreign policy and autocratic, but it's not a return to Cold War

Rochester, NH: McCain Town Hall 07/22/08

Background Details:

- About 500+ people, venue (opera house with 2 balconies) about at capacity
    - Lots of people with "I'm a health care voter" shirts inside and outside the event
    - White, mostly old audience; lots of vets; casual dress
- about 20 protesters outside the event: protesting health care policy and some antiwar protesters
- Standard level of security
- Fairly enthusiastic crowd
- Jim McCaunaghey-- Dems for McCain, co-chair-- gives 1st set of introductory remarks
    - Help us find for Dems for McCain
- Bill Cunden (sp), Stratford County chair, Dems for McCain, gives 2nd set of intro remarks-- explains his conversion to McCain: cut government spending, doesn't have a speech for NH and a speech for IA, etc-- tells people what they need to hear

Speech Highlights:

- McCain thanks Bill and other "old friends"
- I love AZ, but coming to NH is almost like coming home
- Because of the interactions I've had at these town hall meetings, I'll be a much better Prez
- thank you to Bill Kenney, Dick Green, Mayor John LaRochelle, Sheriff Wayne Estes (usually time for his nap now), Rep. Julie Brown, and special to Doris Steinbach and Tom Gibson (thanks for your sacrifice, thank you to vets
- I need to start out talking to you about Iraq--there's been a lot of back-and-forth about whether the surge has succeeded, etc. A lot of you will remember about a year ago when people were questioning the war, I said the surge would succeed. "And we are winning that war." I'm proud and grateful of the great young men and women who have succeeded and of Gen. Petraeus.
- Obama said the surge wouldn't succeed. He would have had us out last March and we would never would have succeeded, we would've been defeated. He was wrong then, wrong now.
- He just received his first briefing from Petraeus, but he declared his policy before he left.
- Our troops will come home with honor and victory. And now Obama wants to reverse the gains we have made and set a date for withdrawal.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- This success is fragile and we cannot reverse it, which we would do if we don't listen to conditions on the ground.
- If we win, we will contain Iranian influence in the region, we will stabilize Iraq--they have a long way to go but we have seen the progress as the government takes control of Mosul and Basra. Obama will do the wrong thng.
- I had the courage to win a war and lose a campaign. It seems Obama would rather lose a war and win a political campaign.
- The same strategy in Iraq can win in Afghanistan, but there's also the poppy plan and dealing with the border with Afghanistan. We need more troops, but we need more help from our NATO allies.
- BTW, Obama just made his first trip to Afghanistan. I look forward to havign more meetings with Obama.
- Divided We Fail is here. ONE is here. Great organizations. I'm proud Cindy and a number of other people are in Africa with ONE right now helping. Maybe later on we'll let both of the orgs have a 60-sec commercial.

- Issue #1 on people's minds is energy. This energy crisis is real; economic, enviro and national security.
- I have a plan to fix this crisis. WE can do it. WE can become energy independent in short period of time. We have to act fast and act together.
- We need alt energies, hydrogen-powered cars, 200-mi-battery-operated cars.
- We are sending billions to foreign countries that don't like us, incl. some into the hands of terrorists. This is one of the biggest transfers of wealth in the history of the world--think of what that does to our deficit.
- I know it's been derided by some--but why not give them a little gas tax holiday? I met a guy the other guy that owns 2 diesel trucks who could stay in business longer with this.
- People here know about Seabrook and you know about nuclear power. It's clean. It's integral to our effort to reduce and eliminate greenhouse gas emissions. We've gone 60 years and never had an accident with nuclear plants on Navy ships.
- We always want to imitate the French. It takes them 5 years to build a nuclear plant. Why should it take US 10-15 years+? Why can't we build 45 plants and employ 700k people.
- In MI, I met with GM people and saw the Volt. I think technology is there. I'd give $5k tax credit. With hybrid cars, flex fuels (incl ethanol), electric cars, we can become energy independetnt. Lexington Project.
- We have to drill off shores. It's out there and we can do it. The oil execs say we could see results within a couple years. When Prez announced we are lifting the fed moratorium, price of gas went down $10 / barrel. So it will have a beneficial effect in the short-term as well as long-term.
- Obama doesnt want to store or reprocess nuclear fuel, doesn't want to drill offshore, doesn't want gas tax holiday. His president seal should've said 'No we won.t'
- 1 of the greatest experiences of my life has been spending so much time here in NH. This is going to be a battleground state. I need your support, I need you out there registering voters. Im not going to let you down. [enthusiastic chanting from crowd]

Question and Answer

- 1Q) [disabled Iraq war vet having trouble getting benefits from VA] Will you facilitate change in the adjudication process that's 90 years old?
    - MCCAIN: We need make some improvements in the recent bill that was passed. I think we can do more. thank you for your service. [rampant applause.
    - McCain makes awkward sound]. There's another vet I see here from the Greatest Generation--Please stand, thank you. We have vets of all wars here and you continue to inspire all of us. I carry with me usually a quote from George Washington about how important it is to treat vets. I was recently at Phoenix V.A., doing a great job. There aren't enough facilities. We need to concentrate our efforts to handle combat-related injuries. We need to expand our ability to treat PTSD--it's going to be big in this war. People stand in line to stand in line for routine health care needs. We need to give them a plastic card to take to their doctor and get the care they need. And we can concentrate on our ability to treat battle-related wounds (PTSD, and battle wounds).
    - And there are numerous efforts where we treat our homeless vets--in Concord... Nashua... Concord and Nashua [tosses microphone to guy in crowd]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

    - AUDIENCE MEMBER: Makes one of McCain's fellow POWs stand.
    - AUDIENCE MEMBER (vet): "You may get mixed up, John, but we know where your heart is."

- MCCAIN: "Call me"

- 2Q) I'm going to give a little straight-talk. [jokes back and forth about NYYs] I have a statement about a lot of your staffers. I know I'm going to be on their shit-list, but I don't care. [MCCAIN: "shh"] These 2 volunteers have done more work than any of your paid staff people. You gotta make some changes. [McCain says a lot of them are on work-release program].
    - MCCAIN: I'll fix it. Our folks will sit down and chat with you about what needs to be fixed. I know that campaigns succeed through volunteers.

- [inaudible from crowd]
- 3Q) ONE campaign-- [Volunteer explains what organization is] [McCain tries to hurry him] thank you for your help un-sticking PETFAR--it's already saved a couple million lives around the world. Our reputation isn't getting out into the world. Recently Secr of Def Gates called for more nonmilitary. Will you make sure necessary appropriations are made so PETFAR, etc. will be funded under your administration?
    - MCCAIN: I admire Gates and the point he was making is that defense is not just military; it's diplomatic, it's ideological. We need to eliminate poverty, HIV/AIDS, etc. which cause people turn to extremism, esp Islamic extremism. Gates is trying to say of course we need a strong military, but this struggle is going to be won too with orgs like yours.

- [Divided We Fail rep -- explains organization -- thanks McCain for bipartisanship] Thanks these orgs. Back in the primary, DWF had a forum and Huckabee and I did it together. and by the way, I thought Huckabee had the best line of the primary: "Jesus would be smart enough not to run for public office"

- 4Q) I'm a loyal supporter, I have a friend with LUPUS. Can I tell my friend you will cover her on pre-existing conditions?
    - MCCAIN: I will take a look at my website and make sure it's as specific as possible. I want to put health care decisions in the hands of families, not government run healthcare, which is what Obama wants. There are people who are 'unisurable'. We need GAPs: fed government and states get together and establish risk pools. Florida has a good proposal. We need to provide health ins and health care to every American: that is affordable and available.

- 5Q) [volunteer] Have you forgiven Mitt Romney? And "Russia. Question mark."
    - MCCAIN: Mitt has been a great friend. He does a better job for me than he did for himself. And his whole fam. Ann is great. Our party is united.
    - MCCAIN: I'm very concerned about Russia. Recently, because they cut oil supplies to the Czechs --they are tremendous allies.
        - Says "Czechoslovakia"--corrects himself "the Czech Republic." As you know, they split years ago and some of us misstate it from time to time.
    - Theyr'e being aggressive toward Georgia, they're not helping with Iran.
    - They're being increasingly autocratic, stifling internal dissent.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- The Czechs and Slovakia have been good friends since they were behind the Iron Curtain.
- I worry. I don't think there's going to be a return to the Cold War. But Russian behavior is less helpful to the world than we anticipated.

- 6Q) We entered the Iraq War illegally and wrong. Americans think USA on the wrong track, Americans want a timeline for withdrawal, and now so's the Iraqi PM. Given the $$$ we're spending in Iraq, that we're creating terrorists there [massive boos from crowd--McCain "trying to ensure right now" that everyone be respectful of everyone's view]. Our tax dollars are needed here for health care, education, real energy solutions. Isn't it time to end the occupation?
  - MCCAIN: thank you. I respect those views. When I proposed the surge, those [poll] #s were a lot worse than the ones you cite. Because my 1st obligation is my country. And I thank you that you would come here and state your views. It's a lot better than the shouting Americans sometimes have. For 4 years, this war was badly mishandled. and we failed. I believe a change in strategy would succeed and it did. Obama said surge wouldn't succeed and it did and he still refuses to acknowledge. I respect Obama's views, but he's wrong. The most important is the future: We have succeeded and we're winning. I'm confident we will reduce Iranian influence, we'll have a stable "flawed but functioning" democracy there, we'll . "Our victory--we are winning, and we have succeeded."
  - FOLLOWUP: We are in IRaq against international law. The deaths of our soldiers and of Iraqi citizens are tragedies and maybe criminal because we invaded. The idea that we may have a stable democratic government there is not ours to impose. WE need to leave, the people of Iraq are asking us to leave, the Iraqi PM is asking us to leave. Why do we have the largest embassy there if we're not trying to steal their oil?
  - MCCAIN: That's not what Americans are fighting for. We're going to withdraw. The question is whether we're going ot withdraw in victory or in defeat. We have succeeded--Sadr City, Basra, Mosul. The people there are safe. [crowd applauds] There will continue to be "spectacular attacks". AQI is not completely defeated.
  - FOLLOWUP: Don't you believe we are inflaming the Muslim world by staying there?
  - MCCAIN: I do not. If we had pulled out, the extremists would've been inflamed...

- 7Q) We're the only state in the US without a full-service hospital. Health care concern.
  - MCCAIN: Thank you.

- MCCAIN [to Iraq questioner] thank you again for your question.
- I will not put my party first, I will put my country first.

- 8Q) For the first time, we have a Dem in all branches. They have fiscally mismanaged. I'm very concerned for people like Sen Sununu; We need to get rid of Porter, etc. Obama has said he will raise taxes. How can you support "our crisis" across this state and nation to bring GOP back into office?
  - MCCAIN I have to run effective campaign and cmapaing hard. I have to campaign with people like our Gov. Peterson. Sen. Sununu is probably one of the smartest in the US Senate. I have to restore trust and confidence in government. And by the way, I agree Sen. Sununu needs to returned. I also agree Obama will raise your taxes. I won't raise your taxes.

- 9Q) I've been to NOLA with aid orgs. How are you going to make response quicker to natural disasters like Katrina?
  - MCCAIN: One of the great tragedies in recent history is not only Katrina but our ability to react to that. It's inexcusable. It'll never happen again when I'm POTUS. We need to have private enterprise more involved. We need to have the best people at the ehad of FEMA, etc. and not political appointees. We need to have state and fed working TOGETHER--there was a breakdown in comms among levels of govt. Some of the fixes have already been implemented, some haven't. We have to be prepared.

    - We have a struggle against radical Islamic extremism, we have to be prepared for them. We also have to be prepared for these other attacks that affect American lives.

- I'm so glad to be back here with you. This is what we need to do. But we need your help. I'll be back and back and back.
- I repeat: I love this country. I've had teh opportunity not to put the country first. Poll recently showed 9% approval rating of Congress. We have to restore trust and confidence in government, namely reaching across the aisle. I have done that my whole life. thank you and God bless.

Hillary Clinton's presidency is not inevitable, but it is as close to it as we've seen in years (Daily Kos)

By Steve Singiser

February 9, 2015

Daily Kos

Depending on your stance on the presumptive Democratic frontrunner, many casual political observers are either confident or resigned when faced with the prospect of Hillary Clinton avenging the narrow defeat of her 2008 campaign for president and sweeping her way both to the Democratic nomination and into the White House.

Which is why, it seems, those who are critical of the former First Lady/U.S. Senator/Secretary of State seem very invested in crushing this creeping sense of inevitability about her 2016 prospects.

On the right, we have seen a lot of "she's really not that popular, folks" (here is a nice little tweet in that vein).

And, now, we are seeing a similar pushback on the left. Late in January, a handful of wealthy Democrats still pining for an Elizabeth Warren candidacy financed a survey that had a battery of message-testing questions clearly designed to show that Clinton had vulnerabilities on a whole host of issues, ones that could hamstring her both in the primary and in the general election.

Make no mistake—there is potential merit in both efforts at pushback, on the right and the left. However, there are also substantial issues with both critiques, and the fact remains that Hillary Clinton is arguably in a more enviable position heading into a presidential election cycle than anyone in over a generation. Follow me past the fold to look at why these critiques of the "Clinton inevitability" are more nuanced than they appear, and why Clinton might be in a more commanding position than any of the "frontrunners" of the recent past.

Dobson is one of the more engaging Twitter presences on the political right, and his background in polling makes him someone that political junkies already have a working familiarity with. But he's being perhaps just a little cute here.

HuffPo/Pollster's default range on the y-axis (percentages, typically) run between 10-70, but Dobson switched it instead to a range 30-60, to make the tightening of the graph look sharper. Now, there's nothing inherently evil in that (I've done it myself, to try to detect slight trends in numbers that, by and large, have stayed within the 40 yard lines, so to speak), but it does tend to exaggerate trends. If you use the default Pollster parameters, for example, that graph looks more like this:

While the trajectory is still not splendid for team Clinton, that doesn't give the same visual impact of "collapsing support" that Dobson's tweet elicits.

Circumstances look even less perilous for Clinton when one excludes a single pollster. Given that the appetite for Hillary Clinton's favorabilities (especially two or three years out from the 2016 election) is not terribly high, there has been a relative paucity of polling on the matter. The lone exception to this relative data blackout is a single source: YouGov. The internet panel-based pollster polls on Clinton's fav/unfav on a weekly basis, which allows them to flood the zone. Indeed, 22 of the last 28 polls on Clinton's standing (dating back to last July) have come from YouGov.

And as it happens, the lone pollster is also far more bearish on the presumptive Democratic frontrunner than anyone else, it would seem. According to HuffPo/Pollster, Hillary Clinton's fav/unfav has been tested a dozen times since the midterms. Eight of those polls have been YouGov surveys, and she has treaded water, with a net fav/unfav of 47/46. Four of those polls have come from elsewhere. In those four polls, there is tangible difference. While Clinton's favorable ratings are not markedly different (49 percent), her unfavorable ratings are down several points from YouGov (40 percent).

Indeed, if you take YouGov out of the equation, and run the same graph that Dobson used, it looks like this instead:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Now it cannot be ignored that while Dobson might have been a bit clever in magnifying the appearance of the impact, there is still clear evidence of tightening in the graph, even if you exclude YouGov and use the default parameters. That it no longer looks like the complete collapse of support that initial tweet implied does not it mean that it is not a cause for alarm.

Clinton critics credibly could argue that should that trend continue as the campaign cycle wears on, she is liable to be exceptionally vulnerable in 20 months. But Clinton advocates could argue, with equal credibility, that she has been a primary target of conservatives (and some disenchanted liberals) for literally decades at this point, has universal name recognition, and still has a net positive favorability rating, a positive rating that none of her potential GOP opponents has managed to consistently register.

And, indeed, that is where much of the optimism in camp Clinton undoubtedly lies. Early polling is just that: early. But the early numbers for 2016 paint a picture that cannot be very satisfying for Republicans seeking to derail the Democratic frontrunner. Their likely alternatives are, by and large, getting thumped by Clinton in early trial heats. As an example, the RCP polling averages for the half-dozen most likely Clinton vs. GOP matchups show that no Republican candidate averages closer than an 8-point deficit to the Democrat.

Meanwhile, a series of battleground state polls released this week by Quinnipiac were nothing short of stunning. In the critical swing states of Florida and Ohio (as well as Pennsylvania, which pundits have cited as a key 2016 GOP target), Clinton not only crushed most of the GOP field by double digits, but also led favorite sons in all three states. In Florida, a state Obama won by under a point, her average lead was nearly 12 points. In Ohio, a state Obama won by a 51-48 margin, Clinton led by over 10 points. In Pennsylvania, where Obama won by a markedly reduced margin in 2012, Clinton's average lead was 17.

Those numbers have to be sending off enormous alarms in GOP circles. If one accepts the premise that the GOP already faces a slight generic headwind in the Electoral College (and the evidence is there, even if it is far from overwhelming), then one has to assume that the GOP has to hold its states and pick off several Obama 2008/12 states. If the Q poll is anywhere close to correct, three of the closest Obama 2012 states are effectively out of reach. Meanwhile, national polls, with only rare exceptions, have Clinton ahead of all GOP comers by at least as much as Obama won in 2012. The only saving grace for the GOP may well be that their current flavor of the month (Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker) has been featured in nearly none of those polls.

Indeed, one of the few polls of recent vintage that shows Clinton without a commanding lead over her GOP rivals (and did poll Walker, showing Clinton with a three-point edge) is the aforementioned PPP poll that sought to highlight Clinton's liabilities.

But in a poll that was commissioned to explore her vulnerabilities, particularly (it would seem) with voters on the left, it is telling that the sponsors of the poll did not ask the pollster to look at how Warren, or other prominent Democrats, would stack up against Clinton.

Then again, a quick glance at this chart (put together by our own Dreaminonempty) may well make it clear why the folks who commissioned the poll demurred from primary election trial heats:

Clinton may well have been a frontrunner back in 2008, and may have even been seen as "inevitable" to some back then, but she starts this cycle in a considerably more enviable position, from a polling perspective. In a piece by the Fix's Sean Sullivan this week, he interpreted a UNH poll in the Granite State as a bad sign for Clinton, because only 7 percent have "definitely decided" on their pick (eleven months out!). But he also notes that, at present, Clinton has a 44-point lead, despite the fact that two of the more viable potential Democrats (Sen. Warren and Sen. Bernie Sanders) hail from states that neighbor New Hampshire, and might have at least a little "home base" appeal. On a related note, none of those recognizable potential rivals for the nomination couldn't get closer than 19 points in a Gravis poll of New Hampshire this week. If the best you can get, in arguably your most favorable terrain, is down 44-25, that could act as a bit of a deterrent.

Indeed, Clinton's early "edge," such as it is, is that she is perceived (and the data supports this, by and large) as the clear frontrunner in both the Democratic primary and the general election. We really haven't seen that combination in decades. Some were facing perilous primaries, but their party looked, on paper, to be in an enviable position in the general (see: 2008). On other occasions, there was no primary action, but the general election outcome was in doubt (see: 2004 and 2012).

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In fact, the last campaign in the same solid early position as Clinton might well be a cautionary tale for team Hillary. That is because one could argue that the last presidential candidate to be such an unambiguous frontrunner, in both primary and general election polling, was George W. Bush.

Given the ultimate outcome (which was ... ahem ... highly ambiguous), it is hard to remember that there was a time when Bush looked like somewhat of a lock, not just in the 2000 GOP primary, but when paired against Al Gore, as well. In fact, a quick glance at polls from almost 16 years ago today tell us the tale of the tape:

A March 1999 CNN poll not only had Bush leading Al Gore by a healthy 52-41 margin, but it also had Bush leading a provisional GOP primary field of 10 candidates with 48 percent of the vote (and a healthy 31-point edge over his nearest rival, Elizabeth Dole).

An April 1999 Pew poll had Bush leading Gore by a 54-41 margin, even as the poll also showed that President Bill Clinton had a 62-percent approval rating.

A spate of polls from this exact point in the cycle (February 1999) showed George W. Bush with leads ranging from 10 to 21 points over Al Gore.

Surely those general election polls are instructive, because they show that no lead is insurmountable, even in a presidential election in which name recognition is practically universal. But the early primary polls are, in their own right, instructive.

The CNN poll linked above, taken in March 1999, had John McCain at 3 percent, and in a tie for fifth place with Steve Forbes. By the second month of the primary season, McCain was in the 30s, and though he never quite materialized as a mortal threat to Bush's nomination, he threw a legitimate scare into Team Bush.

Will someone materialize that will put team Clinton on high alert? Will the GOP coalesce around a candidate and storm back into a lead? The answers could very well be "yes" and "yes". However, Hillary Clinton starts out in as good a position, and quite possibly a better one, than even Bush found himself in 16 years ago.

If you are a Clinton supporter, and want to feel a surge of optimism, consider this challenge: Name a presidential candidate who was in this solid a position at this point in the cycle, and didn't win? (Political historians can argue that one out in the comments.)

Pessimistic political Eeyores, meanwhile, can state what is obviously true: Just because it hasn't happened in a long while, doesn't mean it won't happen this time.

The fade of the liberal left (Iowa State Daily)

By Clay Rogers

February 9, 2015

Iowa State Daily

A tectonic shift is occurring in American politics. The old guard of the Democratic Party will soon be far too ancient to contest an election. This creates serious problems for the party once 2016 passes. It's obvious that Hillary Clinton and Joe Biden will soon announce their candidacy, but who will fill the ranks when they're gone?

It's important to know that there was once a socially conservative generation deemed "The Greatest Generation." These, the heroes of Anzio and Guadalcanal, gave birth to a litter of selfish creatures called "baby boomers." The baby boomers soon colonized communal settlements known as colleges. Yes, it was here in this garden of earthly delight that millions of children sowed the seeds of sex, drugs, and rock 'n' roll, which would destroy our civilization.

This is the cultural revolution that most prominent democrats belong. Hillary Clinton, John Kerry, Joe Biden, Nancy Pelosi and Harry Reid are all remnants of that era. The '60s revolutionaries were fierce and brazen because liberalism was brazen during that time period. But now, times have changed. Liberalism predominates and modern Democrats are left with nothing to rebel against. The revolution has ended and the time of the milquetoast liberal has begun.

In her youth, Hillary Clinton dipped her hands in the blood of the revolution that uprooted our Christian society. She and her contemporaries were fanatical, and their fanaticism helped turn them into popular politicians. Indeed, I challenge any reader to produce an example of a new Democratic face that could compete with Hillary. There is no competition even among her own cohort.

It is my firm belief that in two years we'll have another Clinton in the White House. "Uncle" Joe Biden is the only other serious contender for the Democratic nomination. According to polling data, Hillary runs 40 points ahead of her nearest Democratic competitor in the state of Iowa. If one supposes, as I do, that Republicans cannot win a national majority in 2016, then there's no way she can lose. But what happens after she's gone?

The Republicans have time on their side. While the Democratic lower ranks are barren, the Republicans have no shortage of rising stars. Rand Paul, Ted Cruz, Scott Walker, Marco Rubio and Joni Ernst will all be around for decades to come. Though none of these people stand much of a chance against Hillary, they may sweep the field in the 2020s. Where is the new generation of democratic leaders who will stand against them?

We caught a glimpse of the future last fall. The Republicans swept congress because Democratic resistance was so feeble. The Iowa race was a great example. Leaving politics aside, Ernst was infinitely more interesting than Bruce Braley. A motherly war veteran who packs a gun in her purse faced a sort of awkward-looking white guy. And Democrats ran awkward candidates across the entire country.

The difference between the parties is quite profound. Conservatives hate their establishment, and wait like hyenas around a dying elephant for its departure. Democrats have nothing but an establishment. What will happen when the Bruce Braleys of this world inherit the party? The Democratic tribe does a very good job at stirring itself up into a wild frenzy during presidential campaigns, but will the tribe be so inspired when its champions are gone?

Well, that's the future, what about the present? In 2016, Republicans will probably commit election suicide as usual. They run elections so poorly that I've come to believe they actually enjoy losing. If Jeb Bush gets the nomination, then the election is as good as over. They'll split the conservative vote among four or five minor candidates and allow a liberal Republican like Bush to take the nomination. Most true conservatives would rather be hit by a train than vote for Jeb Bush.

Liberals have the habit of not turning out in mid-term elections. With the Democratic warrior queen leading them into battle, turn out will not be a problem in 2016. Republicans may have youthful candidates on their side, but the culture is not. It goes without saying that our country is now center-left. The new liberal majority has many members in the GOP wanting to shift left. This adds another incentive to run a suicidal candidate like Jeb Bush.

Though the culture war ended many years ago, the culture warriors survived. Cunning, ruthlessness and cruelty hoisted them to the top. It'll be a different society when they're gone. Hillary Clinton's acceptance speech will almost certainly be the last gurgling bubbles of a sinking ship.

Sanders: I would 'run to win' in 2016 (The Hill)

By Kevin Cirilli

February 9, 2015

The Hill

Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) says he will be running to win in 2016 if he decides to challenge Hillary Clinton in a Democratic primary.

"I am giving thought to running for president of the United States," Sanders said in a speech at the Brookings Institution in Washington on Monday. "But don't tell my wife... If I run I want to run to win and to run to win we need to have millions of people actively involved."

Sanders said he'd need the help of a "vibrant grassroots movement all over this country that says to the billionaire class, 'Sorry — government is going to work for all of us and not just for the one percent.'"

Sanders, who caucuses in with Democrats in the Senate, declined to say whether he would enter into the race if Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) decided to run, too.

Warren has insisted she's not running for president, but progressive grassroots groups are trying to change her mind. Sanders called Warren "brilliant."

"I will not be a spoiler," Sanders said, reiterating previous comments that he's made about how he would not run as an independent but as a Democrat.

"If I run and if Secretary Clinton runs what I would hope would happen is that we have a debate about how you rebuild the middle class," Sanders said. "I also understand political realities and that is when you take on the billionaire class -- it ain't easy."

Clinton maintains a dominant lead in 2016 Democratic polling against Sanders, Warren and Vice President Biden. None of the prospective Democratic candidates have officially declared they are running.

Sanders criticized Wall Street extensively, saying it had become "an island unto itself where its goal is to make as much money as it can."

"I don't want to be too dramatic here, but I happen to believe that the business model of Wall Street is fraud and deception," Sanders said.

How Bernie Sanders Would Run Against Hillary Clinton (National Journal)

By Lauren Fox

February 9, 2015

The National Journal

Sen. Bernie Sanders has a clear view of what he will be up against if he runs for president in 2016; billionaires, Wall Street, Hillary Clinton, and a less-than-stellar name ID. But while the Vermont senator once received single digit-support for statewide elections in Vermont, he has shown a propensity as a pragmatic campaigner with keen insight into what it takes to spark a grassroots movement.

But whether he can mobilize enough people in 2016 to make the race worth his while is still a question even he has not answered.

"I don't want to run a futile campaign," Sanders said during an appearance at the Brookings Institution Monday.

In recent months, Sanders has traveled around the country, hitting early primary states like New Hampshire and Iowa. He's confident, in talking with voters, that there is an appetite for a straight talking candidate in the Democratic primary who can articulate a clear vision to reduce income inequality and isn't afraid to call out Wall Street as a business model built on "fraud and deception."

If he does run, Sanders said, he's not looking to be a "spoiler" in the mode of Ralph Nader. He's instead considering shedding his "independent" label and jumping into the race for the Democratic ticket, where he fully recognizes he'd likely be going head-to-head on the debate stage with the Democratic Party's presumptive candidate Hillary Clinton.

Sanders sees running against Clinton, however, as an opportunity not to tear her apart politically, but to distinguish himself and force the party to have a serious policy discussion on issues as diverse as income inequality and foreign policy.

"This is a woman I respect, clearly a very intelligent person who I think is impressive on issues by the way," Sanders said. "I think we have a debate about how you rebuild a crumbling middle-class, a debate about how you reverse climate change, a debate about the foreign policy...a debate about Wall Street, and that would be, I think, good for the American people, to be honest with you."

On Monday, Sanders began by distinguishing himself on foreign policy. He reasserted his opposition to more troops in Iraq, a conflict Clinton initially voted in favor of authorizing military action for during her time in the Senate. Sanders also said he feared the U.S. was entangling itself in an "endless war" in the Middle East. Instead of the U.S. spending its resources and developing the lead strategy, countries like Saudi Arabia, for example, needed to step up, he said. Sanders also announced he would not attend Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's planned address to Congress, an issue Clinton has yet to weigh in on.

Sanders emphasized that, despite pointing out contrasts, he won't run negative ads against Clinton. He didn't during his mayoral races, Senate races or for congressional seats, he said. And he is not going to start now.

"It is not my style to trash people," Sanders said.

While Sanders said he doesn't expect fellow progressive Sen. Elizabeth Warren, D-Mass., to jump into the presidential fray, he didn't miss an opportunity to highlight her vision and accomplishments before the audience at Brookings.

"We brought senator, well Elizabeth Warren to the town meetings and she blew me away with her ability to deal with complicated economic issues in a language that people could understand," Sanders said. "I'm a fan of Elizabeth Warren."

The main obstacle for Sanders may not just be Clinton, however. Part of running a successful campaign is filling campaign coffers. And, in a cycle where the billionaire Koch brothers have already pledged to spend almost $900 million, Sanders will have to do better than merely relying on his engaged network to make small donations. That remains a stumbling block Sanders is not confident he can overcome.

"If you had two million people putting in 100 bucks, that's $200 million, that is 20 percent of what the Koch brothers themselves are prepared to spend," Sanders said. "Can you take that on? I don't know the answer. Maybe the game is over. Maybe they have bought a United States government. Maybe there is no turning back. I don't know. I surely hope not, but we have to look at that reality."

If he is going to run, Sanders says he has to be sure he is going to make a serious impact on the race if he does.

"I want to do it well and it's important not just for my ego I do it well. It's important for millions of people who share the same set of beliefs that I hold," Sanders said. "To do it well, we would have to put together the strongest grassroots movement in the modern history of this country with millions of people are saying, 'you know what? Enough is enough. We are going to take on the billionaire class.'"

Is Bernie Sanders The 2016 Progressive Candidate? He's Considering A "Not Hillary" Presidential Campaign (Bustle)

By Alicia Adamczyk

February 9, 2015

Bustle

She might not have officially announced a run for president in 2016, but progressives are already offering alternatives to a Hillary Clinton candidacy. Sen. Elizabeth Warren is often the first name that comes to mind, but Sen. Bernie Sanders, an independent from Vermont, is also toying with the idea of launching a campaign as the "Not Hillary" candidate. But does he have a chance?

Since speculation began that Clinton would launch another bid for president, some progressive groups have been actively seeking an alternative candidate, one a little more outside the establishment than Clinton, who could take the nomination or at least move the former Secretary of State a bit more to the left on key issues. Although populist candidate Warren, who made a name for herself as a crusader against moneyed Wall Street interests, has been the favorite, Sanders is also drawing attention for his longtime commitment to liberal causes and aversion to playing political games.

In an interview with MSNBC on Saturday, Sanders promised there would be "real differences" between himself and Clinton. But Sanders has no organized campaign infrastructure and lacks the funding that Clinton and Warren are already enjoying from PACs established months, and in Clinton's case, years, ago. In early polls, he trails Clinton by more than 50 points. At 73, he is six years older than Clinton, who already had to defend herself against arguments that she is too old to effectively lead the nation.

Not that Sanders seems to be particularly worried. At a conference this weekend held by Keystone Progress, the largest progressive organization in Pennsylvania, Sanders went after billionaires, saying they are "addicted to money," and calling for a "political revolution" that would take the country back in time and allow Americans to support their families on a 40-hour work week. He is expected to further lay out his agenda at the Brookings Institution on Monday. The executive director of Democracy for America Charles Chamberlain told MSNBC in December:

The results from our first 2016 presidential pulse poll indicates that progressives want to hear from many candidates during the nomination process and that the fight for the support of Democrats' grassroots base is far from over.

Warren, for her part, has repeatedly said she does not want to run for president and has given no indication that she will change her mind. Once it becomes clear she isn't in the running, Sanders will likely enjoy support from current Warren proponents. Will it be enough? If he can reinvigorate the Democratic base, get them mad enough about those "addicted to money" billionaires and inspired by his political revolution, he might have a chance.

Hillary Clinton Gets Ready with A Big Team-in-Waiting for Presidential Race Campaign (International Business Times)

By Kalyan Kumar

February 9, 2015

International Business Times

Hillary Clinton, widely considered as the Democratic nominee for the Presidency race of 2016 has quietly put together a massive campaign team-in-waiting. Interestingly, this is before any official announcement has been made on her candidature. In terms of the size and talent of Clinton team, reports say that it can outstrip anything that is on the rival Republican side.

The Washington Post reports that Clinton has already appointed a campaign chairman, campaign manager, chief strategist and lead pollster, associate pollster, lead media adviser, communication director, deputy communications director, focus group director and communications strategist. The report also added that Clinton is close to finalising her New York City campaign headquarters and looking for a suitable date to make these official announcements.

White House senior adviser John Podesta is reportedly heading the recruitment of Clinton's team. But the final decision is vetted by Clinton herself. Though Clinton faces no competition for Democratic campaign talent, she has told senior advisers that the legal framework of the campaign needs to be in place by this spring.

The report says that the advanced planning of the campaign team is also a sign that Clinton will be the official Democratic nominee, who will run in support of a sitting president and his agenda. Clinton has already hired many former aides of President Obama to assist her in the campaign.

Key Obama Aide

Jim Messina, who was with Mr Obama during his campaign and engineered Clinton's downfall in 2008, is the head of super Political Action Committee devoted to supporting her in 2016. "It's her turn and her time," he said on MSNBC and added "we're going to do whatever it takes to make sure she's the president of the United States."

Thus the political machinery that helped in the victory of Mr Obama twice, has thrown its weight behind Clinton candidacy. While Podesta is advising Clinton unofficially, he may soon take up the post of campaign chairman and has announced the decision to leave the White House within a few weeks. White House communications director Jennifer Palmieri will be donning the role of communication head in the Clinton campaign.

Clinton's close advisers are also looking at ways to keep her in a fighting mode throughout the slow and uneventful early phase of the campaign. There will also be a strategy to distance herself from Mr Obama regime by focusing more on populist and base-friendly economic issues despite her association with Mr Obama administration as a former secretary of state. Clinton is keen to project her foreign policy to be more self-assured than that of Mr Obama.

Sander's Challenge

Meanwhile, Hill News reports that Senator Bernie Sanders can be a challenger to Clinton in the primarry. He has claimed that voters will see stark differences between himself and Hillary Clinton if the two decide to run for the White House in 2016.

Sanders told on MSNBC's "Up with Steve Kornacki" that though he likes and respects Hillary Clinton, on issues like massive investments in infrastructure, real tax reform and "on the need to deal in a very bold way with the planetary crisis of climate change, with the transpacific partnership, I suspect we will have some real differences."

Sanders is mulling to enter the 2016 Democratic presidential primary. If Sanders runs, he will be highlighting the goals of the progressive wing of the party, which wants bold policies to address the rising income inequality in the United States.

David Axelrod: Hillary Clinton needs to run like a challenger (Politico)

By Adam B. Lerner

February 9, 2015

Politico

President Barack Obama's former campaign guru and White House adviser David Axelrod has a piece of advice for 2016's presumptive Democratic front-runner Hillary Clinton: Run "like an insurgent."

"What she can't rely on, and I don't think she will, is the Clinton name," Axelrod told USA Today's Washington bureau chief Susan Page in an extended interview promoting his new book "Believer."

"I think she has to approach this campaign like a challenger, not like a front-runner," Axelrod said, though he did not dispute Page's assertion that Clinton's lying low in early 2015 is a sign that she might well be falling into old habits.

Axelrod added that Clinton was overly cautious in 2007 when she was considered the "prohibitive front-runner," but "she threw caution to the wind" after losing the Iowa caucuses and developed "visceral connections" with voters that "terrified" him. If she follows the 2008 model and not the 2007 model, Axelrod said, Clinton will be "hard to beat."

Clinton also has a chance to do what Obama could not, Axelrod said — reduce the partisan squabbling in Washington.

Obama, Axelrod wrote in his book, was "clinical and bloodless" in attempting to change the capital's "acrimony" and "ultra-partisanship" — and Washington is arguably as partisan as it has ever been.

The president's failure could be an opportunity for Clinton in 2016, Axelrod said, as she's "exponentially stronger within the Democratic Party" now than she was during her previous campaign.

In 2008, Axelrod said, "her status as someone who had worked within Washington and who was familiar with Washington was actually a liability," whereas in 2016 the country will be searching for someone "who knows how to manage the system, navigate the system."

Assessing the current state of the 2016 Republican field, Axelrod said that former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, as someone who supports immigration and education reform, currently represents the greatest threat to a potential Clinton presidency.

"If he can stick to his guns and hold those positions," he will be able to challenge Democrats' "tactical" and "demographic advantages," Axelrod said.

Axelrod was dismissive of Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, whom he called the "flavor of the month" after Walker gave a "great speech at a little meeting in Iowa to conservatives there."

Though he has publicly offered Clinton advice, Axelrod recently told New York magazine that he doesn't plan on working for her 2016 campaign. "[L]ike a lot of addictions, too much of it is not good for you," Axelrod said of his experience working in national politics.

Forget Brian Williams, it's Hillary Clinton's lie that matters (Washington Times)

By Joseph Curl

February 9, 2015

The Washington Times

One rainy evening, three people walked into a bar and sat down. One was grim, another solemn, while the sole woman among them was absolutely giddy. The bartender poured a few shots of whiskey and said to the trio, "Why so grim, so solemn, so giddy?"

The grim man with squinty eyes and a huge forehead went first. "My life is over. I 'conflated' a couple of war stories, said I was aboard a helicopter in Iraq that got shot down when I wasn't. Now, everything I've worked for my whole life is gone."

"Gee, that's tough," said the bartender.

The even more-horse-faced solemn man next to him went next. "I said I won a bunch of medals for honor and bravery as captain of a fast patrol boat in Vietnam, but then all my comrades swiftly said I was lying. I lost the job I really wanted."

"Damn. Rough. What about you, lady?" the bartender said to the broadly smiling blonde.

"Ha! I once lied and said I outran sniper fire in Bosnia. They even had videotape of me walking calmly across the tarmac to meet a little girl who gave me a poem — a poem! And I'm probably going to be the next president of the United States!"

Let's get something straight right out of the chute: Brian Williams is just a guy on TV. He's not even a reporter, he just reads a 20-second intro into a story gathered by real journalists. In Europe, he wouldn't even be called an "anchor" — a too-lofty term for what he does — he'd be called a "presenter." Rightly so.

Second, no one elected Mr. Williams to anything. He's a paid employee (reportedly $10 million a year) at NBC — which also operates the decidedly liberal MSNBC (of course, there's a lot of crossover between the two). In that way, he's like a plumber who works for Roto-Rooter: An employee who calls in sick now and then and occasionally has to attend that HR presentation on sexual harassment in the office.

So, here's the thing: If you don't like that he lied about being in a helicopter that was hit by an RPG — you have but one way to voice your displeasure: Turn the channel. (And by the way … he most assuredly did "lie about," not "conflate" the RPG attack. How do you "conflate" the time you weren't on a helicopter that was hit with an RPG with the time you were on a helicopter that didn't get hit with an RPG?)

It's far from clear whether Mr. Williams will survive his now-too-numerous-to-list lies — another whopper comes out every day (like the one about seeing a dead body float by in the French Quarter after Hurricane Katrina, except that the French Quarter never flooded). A few sources inside NBC tell me it's touch and go: The top brass want to ride out the storm while lower-level managers — you know, the ones who do the real work — say he just can't stay.

But he's just a TV personality, another hubris-filled, shallow egotist. NBC doesn't care what you think, and if they decide he stays, he stays. You don't have any say in the matter: It's a corporate issue.

But not at all so for Hillary Rodham Clinton. In March 2008, giving a foreign policy speech on Iraq about her days as first lady and a trip to Tuzla, Bosnia, she delivered an unbelievable tale.

"I remember landing under sniper fire. There was supposed to be some kind of a greeting ceremony at the airport, but instead we just ran with our heads down to get into the vehicles to get to our base."

So, picture that: Chopper lands, sniper bullets pinging and zinging everywhere, she and her comrades sprinting across the tarmac, perhaps zigzagging to throw off the sharpshooter.

But it didn't happen. None of it. Right after the speech, she was asked about the sniper fire. "There was no greeting ceremony, and we basically were told to run to our cars. Now, that is what happened," she lied.

A week later, she changed her whole story, telling the Philadelphia Daily News editorial board that she "misspoke." Yes, she said that word. When she said snipers had fired at her, when really a little girl had given her a poem, that was her just "misspeaking."

The next day, she told reporters: "So I made a mistake. That happens. It shows I'm human, which for some people is a revelation." Ha ha, oh, she's so lovely — and human.

Oh, and an incredible liar, a valor thief, a fabulist. And dangerous.

Now, Mr. Williams you're stuck with. But Hillary? She's different. She's no employee of some company — she wants to be the top employee of the American people. You'll decide. Probably best to just say, "Thanks for applying for the job, but we checked your resume and, well, too mendacious. So, don't call us, we'll call you."

Morning Joe Whines About Being "Low On Totem Pole" Because Hillary Clinton Won't Come On (PoliticusUSA)

By Justin Baragona

February 9, 2015

PoliticusUSA

During Monday's broadcast of MSNBC's Morning Joe, co-hosts Mike Brzezinski and Joe Scarborough openly complained about their inability to book likely 2016 Democratic Presidential candidate Hillary Clinton to appear on the show. In a segment discussing early primary states and polls, both Scarborough and Mika took shots at the former Secretary of State, claiming she is scared to appear on a "freeform" show like Morning Joe because the show doesn't have "dimwits" reading pre-arranged questions from a teleprompter. All in all, the bitterness and resentment over their show's apparent lack of importance showed through rather clearly.

Brzezinski began the whinefest by claiming she has reached out numerous times to Clinton's staff to get clarity on some of her positions or to possibly have the ex-First Lady on the show. Later, she contrasted Mrs. Clinton's lack of communication with Morning Joe with that of some potential GOP candidates like Scott Walker and Rand Paul, stating they'd "reached out" to the show to either appear or provide comments. The co-host said at that point that the show was obviously "low on the totem pole," perhaps acknowledging the sinking ratings and lagging popularity of the program.

Scarborough took over at this point and provided his typical smug take on the real reasons why Clinton hasn't appeared on the show. In his opinion, the former Democratic Senator is frightened to come on a show with a tough panel who won't ask her pre-screened questions. He feels that Clinton sees her approval rating among Democrats and doesn't want to risk it by getting challenged by the mighty Joe Scarborough.

> "If I've got an 89% approval rating among the Democrats, why do I want to talk to anybody? Why do I want to go on a show like this one where you have to actually talk about the issues, where they're not dimwits that read a teleprompter and ask you three questions they were told to ask last night. This is freeform.
> There are candidates intelligent enough to handle that and not say stupid things. But there are a lot of candidates, on the Republican side as well, that are just scared to be in this sort of setting. So why would she come?"

While Mika at least somewhat recognized the fact that Clinton may not be appearing on Morning Joe due to its decreasing reputation and plummeting ratings, in Joe's mind, it is all because she is shaking in her boots at the prospect of dealing with him and his tenacious questions. If you ever wanted to see Scarborough's arrogance in full effect, this segment is a prime example.

Brazile: 2016, bumpy roads ahead to the nominations (Herald News)
By Donna Brazile
February 8, 2015
The Herald News

Less than a year from now, voters in Iowa, New Hampshire and elsewhere will gather in town centers, gymnasiums, local libraries and school cafeterias to kick off the 2016 presidential sweepstakes. Ever since the modern political process made running for president a four-year job, this is the time when potential candidates started making their public moves. So how are the two parties' races for the nomination shaping up?

Let's start with the Republican Party. With 2012 GOP nominee and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney's decision not to run in 2016, I wouldn't place too much stock in any polls that show former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush or Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker leading the Republican field. Their leads reflect knee-jerk name recognition, brand loyalty, or flavor-of-the-month enthusiasm – not the kind of support that is going to see them through the next year.

If you're a Republican of my generation, you have probably voted for six presidential tickets with a Bush on it. At this point, Republicans don't so much choose a Bush as they initially acquiesce in the choice of a Bush, so a lot of what appears to be support for Jeb Bush is simply resigned indifference. If you were an active Republican in 2012, whomever you preferred for the nomination, you probably eventually ended up working hard, supporting and arguing on behalf of eventual nominee Romney. So the question is, how will you respond when faced with new and different choices?

When it comes to polling, I would be much more interested in how Republicans respond when some of the candidates are described, rather than named. For instance, what if a survey described Ohio's Gov. John Kasich's credentials? Mail carrier's son, former chairman of the House Budget Committee, two-term governor of the pivotal state of Ohio, re-elected overwhelmingly with support from Democrats and independents. Republican primary voters need to start looking at the resumes of their candidates with the names removed.

Of the Republicans' two legacy candidates – Bush, and Rand Paul, whose fathers both ran for president – it's hard to predict who will have an upper hand with conservative voters. I predict that Bush's establishment support will melt away. His residual rank-and-file support will find its way to Paul and other candidates. But it's hard to write off Bush. People who have made careers writing off Bushes have generally had short careers.

Although he has a steep hill to climb, Bush is at ease with himself and with regular people. His rapport with Latino voters is just what the Republicans need. He's the former governor of the crucial swing state of Florida, and he has a conservative reformer's record that Republicans can take into a general election. His problem is whether, for voters in the general election, three Bushes are one too many, particularly since most voters remember the eight Clinton years more fondly than the 12 combined Bush years.

As has been the case in recent elections, the Republican field is crowded with minor candidates who generate a lot of smoke but never seem to catch fire for long. They tend to be rabble-rousers, holy rollers, regional candidates and Fox News favorites. Most of them stand an excellent chance of succeeding, but only in their real goal, which is either to push the party in the direction of their agenda or to use their candidacy to raise their own profile and potential in the world of conservative media.

On the Democratic side, it's likely we end up with former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, Vice President Joe Biden, former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, former Sen. Jim Webb of Virginia and a few others. Clinton is the front-runner before anyone – including her – has even begun running. She's way ahead even while everyone is still at the starting line.

Clinton could have a Democratic challenger coming at her from the left or from the right, but whoever it is, they would have to come at her from way below her in the polls. The main questions for the Democrats are if Clinton will be challenged within the party and whether that would help or hurt her.

It's possible that a credible primary challenger could help Clinton sharpen her campaigning and debate skills before the general election contest begins. But she hardly lacks campaign experience, and primary contests can be costly. People say that what doesn't kill you makes you stronger, but in presidential primaries, if it doesn't kill you, it still drains your campaign war chest.

While the Republicans face a tough battle with each other, Clinton has what is the equivalent of a first-round bye in the playoffs. The fact that Democrats have a clear front-runner and the Republicans don't is a problem for Republicans, and a clear advantage to Clinton. Before the Republicans can beat her, they have to beat each other – and as we saw in the vicious GOP primary battles of 2012, they have a tendency to beat each other rather severely. The Republicans face a bruising primary season. The only things liable to get bruised on the Democratic side are egos.

The upshot is that at this point, neither party has much of a race. The Democrats have a lopsided contest (but not a foregone conclusion), and the Republicans have less of a race and more like something that resembles a rugby scrum. It remains to be seen if the eventual winner in 2016 is someone whose candidacy was seemingly ordained, or one who emerged from a chaotic clash.

Is Hillary Clinton 'likable enough'? And does it even matter? (WAPO)
By Aaron Blake
February 9, 2015
The Washington Post

A new poll of the 2016 New Hampshire Democratic presidential primary shows pretty much what every other poll has shown: Hillary Rodham Clinton leads by a very wide margin.

The University of New Hampshire survey shows the former secretary of state taking 58 percent of the vote. It also shows about six in 10 likely Democratic primary voters consider her the strongest leader (58 percent) and about two-thirds say she would have the best odds of winning in the general election (66 percent) and has the most experience to be president (68 percent).

But then there are a couple of other ways in which the poll asked voters to compare Clinton to her fellow Democrats. In contrast to the numbers above, only about one-third viewed Clinton as the "most believable" (31 percent), and about the same proportion labeled her the "most likable" (32 percent).

If you just had a little twinge of deja vu, it's because this question has stalked Clinton before. Back in the 2008 Democratic primary, there was plenty of chatter about precisely how likable she was and whether it was holding her campaign back.

The culmination of this was Clinton being asked -- at a New Hampshire debate, no less -- about these criticisms. "Well that hurts my feelings," she deadpanned. Barack Obama then interjected, in a moment of unhelpful candor, that Clinton was "likable enough."

So, to recap, six in 10 New Hampshire Democratic primary voters think Clinton is their candidate, but just three in 10 say she's the most likable.

On some level, we'll concede, this is kind of dumb. Many think that the likability question is asked of Clinton only because she's a woman, and that men aren't held to the same standards. My colleague Nia-Malika Henderson noted this alleged dichotomy last month, with one noted expert saying voters do indeed judge female candidates on likability in a way that doesn't apply to men.

But regardless of whether it's fair, it's a question that has followed Clinton. And even if it's a double standard, it's still a potentially real factor for her when it comes to getting people to vote for her -- at least theoretically.

The good news for Clinton is that, at least at the outset of the 2016 campaign, it's less an issue than it was for her in 2008.

A poll conducted by the Pew Research Center last year showed that 36 percent of Americans said Clinton was "hard to like." That number was 51 percent in March 2008 and 53 percent in April 2008, at the height of her primary contest with Obama.

But it's not just Republicans who consider this a problem for her. Twenty percent of Democrats said she was "hard to like," along with 39 percent of independents. Those are real numbers.

The question from there, though, is does it even matter? Even if it is a hindrance for Clinton, it seems pretty unlikely that it would lose her a primary in which she is the overwhelming favorite. From there, in the general election, partisanship largely takes over, and there are very few voters who are actually up for grabs and could potentially be swayed by whatever likability issues Clinton has.

And even if a fair amount of swing voters think Clinton is "hard to like," that doesn't necessarily mean they wouldn't vote for her. Other considerations, after all, do come into play.

The likability thing might have hurt Clinton somewhat in a primary with the buzzy and very personally likable Obama. And it's possible that it could flare up again as the 2016 campaign gets off the ground.

But without that kind of Obama-esque contrast and with many potentially major issues on the table ahead of the general election, we have a hard time seeing lots of people voting against Clinton because they don't want to have a beer with her.

Hillary Clinton lapping 2016 Democratic field in New Hampshire (Washington Times)
By David Sherfinski
February 9, 2015
Washington Times

Former Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton has a sizable lead over possible Democratic rivals in the early primary state of New Hampshire in a new poll, as she takes steps toward a possible 2016 run for president.

Mrs. Clinton is the first choice of 56 percent of likely 2016 Democratic primary voters, followed by Sen. Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts at 15 percent and Vice President Joseph R. Biden Jr. and Sen. Bernie Sanders, Vermont Independent, at 8 percent apiece.

Some have been calling on Ms. Warren to enter the race as an alternative to Mrs. Clinton, and The New York Times reported that leaders of New York's Working Families Party on Sunday formally encouraged Mrs. Warren to enter the race.

But Ms. Warren has rejected the entreaties and has said she is not running.

Mrs. Clinton is actually viewed more favorably among Democratic primary voters than is Ms. Warren in the poll. Eighty-nine percent have a favorable view of Mrs. Clinton, compared to 9 percent who have an unfavorable one.

Sixty-four percent have a favorable view of Ms. Warren, compared to 14 percent who view her unfavorably.

The Bloomberg Politics/Saint Anselm College poll, conducted Jan. 31-Feb. 5 by Purple Strategies, includes a sample of 400 Democratic primary voters that carries a margin of error of plus or minus 4.9 percent points.

In N.H. poll, Bush leads GOP hopefuls (Boston Globe)
By James Pindell
February 9, 2015
The Boston Globe

The first poll of New Hampshire Republicans conducted entirely after former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney said he was not running for president in 2016 offers good news and bad news for Jeb Bush.

The good news: Bush, the former governor of Florida, tops the Republican field in the state that traditionally holds the nation's first-in-the-nation presidential primary.

The bad news: Bush is deeply unpopular among general election voters in New Hampshire, which is also a critical swing state.

A new Bloomberg Politics/Saint Anselm College poll showed that in the Republican primary, Bush has 16 percent support, Senator Rand Paul of Kentucky has 13 percent, and Governor Scott Walker of Wisconsin has 12 percent. Statistically, with the poll's margin of error of plus or minus 4.9 percent, all three are tied.

The poll of 400 Republican voters and 503 general election voters was conducted by Purple Insights from Jan. 31 through Feb. 5.

Governor Chris Christie of New Jersey, who experts say must win New Hampshire to have any shot at the Republican nomination, netted 10 percent support. All other prospective candidates were in single digits.

Potential Republican primary voters in New Hampshire said Bush's advocacy for comprehensive immigration reform and for the Common Core education standards were "deal killers" for at least one in five of them.

That said, roughly the same share of Republicans said Bush was the best opponent to face Democrat Hillary Clinton in the general election should she enter the race.

This does not mean that Bush would win the state's four electoral votes in the general election.

When comparing how Granite State voters view Bush and Clinton, Bush's unfavorable rating among general election voters is 50 percent, compared with 35 percent favorable.

Clinton, on the other hand, has a 54 percent favorable rating and a 42 percent unfavorable rating among those voters.

Clinton's Greatest Political Strength May Be Hiding in Plain Sight (National Journal)
By Ronald Brownstein
February 9, 2015
National Journal

Much of the debate about Hillary Rodham Clinton's potential appeal to female voters may be focusing on the wrong group of women.

Probably the most frequently-asked question about Clinton's possible coalition as a Democratic nominee in 2016 is whether she can win back the working-class white women who have moved away from her party since 1996. On that issue, the evidence is ambivalent from months of early polling that pits Clinton against potential Republican nominees.

But polls over the past year almost invariably have found Clinton improving--often substantially--over President Obama's lackluster 2012 performance among white-collar white women.

Those college-educated white women have been the fastest-growing part of the white electorate in recent years. If Clinton as a nominee could cement the gains she's shown among those women in most national and state polls over the past year, she would present Republicans with a formidable demographic challenge, even without improving among any other white voters. Her greatest potential strength, in other words, may be hiding in plain sight: her potential connection to the white-collar white women who most resemble her.

All polls of the 2016 race at this point are recording only distant impressions long before most voters have seriously focused on their choices. The actual campaign, and events yet to occur, will inevitably scramble the equation.

Yet, especially with a candidate as familiar as Clinton, these early soundings can be viewed as a kind of rebuttable presumption: they sketch the coalition that may naturally gravitate to her unless opponents present them with a case not to.

The contours of a potential Clinton coalition were sketched in the three Quinnipiac University polls released last week in the key swing states of Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Florida. Obama won all of them in 2012, and any Democrat who wins at least two of the three would be in a commanding position to assemble an Electoral College majority in 2016.

The Quinnipiac results reinforced other early surveys in showing the potential for Clinton to improve on Obama's 2012 performance among white-collar white women--and perhaps also notch some gains with their blue-collar counterparts. Despite all the focus on the gender gap, Obama won in 2012 while capturing only 42 percent of all white women, according to exit polls. That was the weakest performance for any Democratic nominee since Walter Mondale in 1984, leaving plenty of room for Clinton to grow if she wins the Democratic nomination.

The most consistent note in the new Quinnipiac surveys was Clinton's strength among college-educated white women. Those women--most of them liberal on cultural issues and many more open than most other whites to an activist role for government--have provided Democratic presidential candidates the most reliable support in the white community since Bill Clinton's first election. The Democratic presidential nominee carried them in 1992, 1996, 2000, and 2008, and essentially split them in 2004. But in 2012, Obama lost ground with them, falling back to 46 percent nationally, the weakest performance among them for any Democratic nominee since Michael Dukakis in 1988.

According to detailed results provided by Quinnipiac to Next America, the new surveys show Clinton notably improving on Obama's performance among those well-educated white women in each of these three key states. The Quinnipiac Polls were conducted via landline and cell phone in each state from January 22 through February 1.

In Florida, Obama won 43 percent of college-educated white women in 2008 and 42 percent in 2012. The new surveys found Clinton drawing 50 percent of them against former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, 53 percent against New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, and 55 percent against Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul.

In Ohio, Obama carried a 52 percent majority of those women in 2008, but slipped back to 47 percent in 2012, while Mitt Romney won 51 percent. Compared to Obama's four-point Ohio deficit among the college white women, the Quinnipiac polls show them providing Clinton an edge of seven points over Bush, 17 over Christie, and 22 over Paul. (The Ohio poll produced a much larger undecided share among upscale women than the other two surveys.)

And in Pennsylvania, where Obama won 55 percent of those women in 2008 but tumbled to just 44 percent in 2012, Clinton displayed the most strength. The Quinnipiac Polls showed her at 56 percent among them against Christie, 58 percent against Bush, and 62 percent against Paul.

By contrast, the Quinnipiac Polls show considerably less strength for Clinton among non-college white women. Those so-called waitress moms have given most of their votes to Republicans in each election since Bill Clinton carried a plurality of them in 1996. Nationally, Obama carried just 39 percent of them in 2012.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In Florida, Obama won only 36 percent of the "waitress moms" in 2008 and 40 percent in 2012. The Quinnipiac polls place Clinton squarely in that range, at 36 percent among them against Bush, 41 percent against Paul, and 43 percent against Christie. But because large numbers of these women remain undecided in the survey, Clinton leads Christie with them, and only trails Paul narrowly while still facing a double-digit deficit against Bush.

In Ohio, Obama won 44 percent of these women in 2008 and 45 percent in 2012. That wasn't an overwhelming performance, but it was enough above his national showing to help him carry the state. The Quinnipiac surveys show Clinton settling exactly in that range, drawing 44 percent against Christie, and 45 percent against both Bush and Paul. Again, though, because of a large undecided contingent, Clinton leads against all three with those women.

The surveys showed Clinton making the clearest gains among blue-collar women in Pennsylvania. Obama posted nearly identical showings there with these women--47 percent in 2008 and 46 percent in 2012. Quinnipiac found Clinton attracting 49 percent of them against both Christie and Bush, and 53 percent against Paul. While Obama lost these women by seven points in 2012 and four in 2008, Clinton leads with them against all three Republicans.

The results were similar in polls from NBC News and Marist College last summer in Iowa and New Hampshire. Matched again against Christie, Paul and Bush, those surveys showed her attracting just under half of non-college white women in both states. But against all three men, she drew 52-54 percent of college white women in Iowa, and exactly 64 percent of them in New Hampshire. National Quinnipiac surveys last year testing Clinton against all three men also put her at 50 percent or more among college-plus white women, and generally at 40-45 percent among non-college white women.

Veteran Democratic pollster Geoff Garin, a senior strategist for Clinton during her 2008 primary campaign, notes that she ran very well among working-class white women during that contest against Obama. "The question is whether she can reconnect to non-college educated white women the same way she was doing at the end of her 2008 campaign," Garin says. "If she can, that has the potential to change the arithmetic. But I think that answer is yet to be determined." By contrast, he said, there's more evidence in early polling that college white-women "are with her. We see that very clearly."

With other groups of voters, the new Florida, Ohio, and Pennsylvania Quinnipiac polls show Clinton largely tracking Obama's 2012 performance. The polls give her cavernous leads among African-Americans--though with a large undecided bloc, her support doesn't yet quite match Obama's 2012 performances in Ohio and Florida. (It's already close in Pennsylvania.) Her showings in the three states among white men without a college education are consistently weak, but not noticeably worse than Obama's numbers with them when he won each of these three states twice. In Ohio, for instance, Obama won 44 percent of blue-collar white men in 2008 and 39 percent in 2012. The Quinnipiac polls put Clinton at 39 percent of them against Christie, 40 percent against Paul, and 42 percent against Bush, (Again, because a substantial portion remains undecided, Clinton's deficits in the polls among these men in all three states are much smaller than Obama's in 2012.)

Her performance among college-educated white men in the surveys also generally follows close to Obama's share in 2012. In Ohio, for instance, Obama tumbled from 47 percent with those men in 2008 to 33 percent in 2012; Clinton draws 34 percent of them against Christie, 35 percent against Bush, and 37 percent against Paul. The same caveat applies to these results: because of large undecided populations, her deficits among these men are much smaller than Obama's in 2012.

Still, these polls present results that are largely consistent across the states--and also consonant with those other national and state polls measuring Clinton's early appeal. Almost everything could change once the campaign is actually joined. But for now, surveys like these Quinnipiac polls generally show some modest opportunities for Clinton to improve among working-class white women and little change relative to Obama's meager 2012 standing among both blue-collar and white-collar men. With minority voters, she remains in a very strong position, though Republicans argue it's unproven that African-Americans will turn out for her at the rates they did for Obama.

The big opening signaled by these polls is her opportunity to recover from Obama's 2012 trough among college-educated white women. That's an especially ominous prospect for Republicans because those upscale women have steadily increased their share of the electorate since the 1980s. If those trends continue, in 2016 they could cast more of the national vote than either college or non-college white men, or the waitress moms. Clinton's biggest boost over Obama might come from nothing more complex than consolidating her most natural supporters.

Pitting politics vs. public health (Chicago Tribune)
By Clarence Page
February 8, 2015
Chicago Tribune

Is support for childhood vaccinations a partisan issue? Polls indicate that it isn't, yet Republicans appear to be getting stung by this needle more than Democrats are.

The question has come up after Republican presidential hopefuls Chris Christie and Rand Paul said that parents should have a choice and not be required by law to immunize their children.

Paul, a U.S. senator and licensed ophthalmologist from Kentucky, went further in a CNBC interview. He expressed belief in a link between vaccines and "profound mental disorders," even though the only study that claimed such a link was later debunked.

Christie, the New Jersey governor who famously and unnecessarily confined a nurse on the suspicion that she might have Ebola, clarified his immunization stance a bit after a backlash. Scientific support for vaccination was "pretty indisputable," he said.

President Barack Obama and other leading presidential hopefuls in both parties also urged parents to get their kids vaccinated, while mostly tiptoeing around the question of whether the vaccine should be required.

Among Democrats, Hillary Clinton, still holding the Democratic field pretty much to herself, tweeted confidence: "The science is clear: The earth is round, the sky is blue, and #vaccineswork." Obama on NBC's "Today" show similarly urged parents to get their kids vaccinated.

As parents who refuse to vaccinate their kids, often called "anti-vaxxers," receive widespread blame for a resurgence of measles in this country, a partisan dispute has arisen over which anti-vaxxers to blame: upper-income, organic-food-buying liberals or libertarian, anti-government, tea party conservatives?

After all, conservatives have been quick to point out, the new measles epidemic originated in politically blue California, one of the states that offers a variety of voluntary "personal belief" exemptions to parents who want to opt out of mandatory vaccine requirements.

Red-state Mississippi, by comparison, offers no religious exemption for vaccines, has the highest compliance rate in the country and hasn't had a reported measles case in two decades, according to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

Liberals respond that, while anti-vaxxers certainly exist on the left -- and some even fit the stereotypes about yuppie organic-food shoppers -- they have essentially no political influence as a group. Since the Bill Clinton era, the Democratic Party has tried to corral its fringe elements, while Republicans have struggled between their right wing and their far-right wing.

Even so, on the "vaxx" issue, a new Pew Research Center poll finds the divide falls along lines of generations more than politics. While strong majorities across the board support vaccination, about one-third of Republicans and also of independents say parents should make the decision about immunizations, compared with 22 percent of Democrats.

Interestingly, Pew found no such divide between Democrats and Republicans in 2009, the pollsters said.

That's a disturbing development on several levels. If vaccine denialism becomes like climate change and Obama's birth certificate, issues to be divided by political leanings more than evidence, we are likely to see an increase in anti-vaxx refuseniks and a larger pool of vulnerable, unvaccinated children to spread more dangerous diseases.

Critics on the right point out that both Obama and Hillary Clinton raised questions in 2008 about a possible link between vaccines and autism. That's true. But two years later, the only study that claimed such a link was retracted by the medical journal that published it and its author lost his medical license.

Yet the lie persists, partly because of something called "confirmation bias," a fancy way of saying that we believe what we want to believe.

New evidence is offered by a major new study in the journal Pediatrics led by political scientist Brendan Nyhan of Dartmouth College.

In testing four separate pro-vaccine messages, including three that the CDC uses, the study found none of the messages increased the intent of parents to vaccinate their children -- and in several cases actually increased the unfounded belief that vaccines cause autism.

Such grim determination by many humans to believe the worst offers a tempting territory for politicians who are not above pandering to fears and suspicions. But when our elected leaders fear the criticism of anti-vaxx factions more than they fear for public health, it leaves all of us more exposed.

Boris to have talks with Clinton as Mayor's roadshow hits the US (Independent)
Pippa Crerar
February 9, 2015
The Independent

Boris Johnson will sit down for talks with Hillary Clinton this week during a six-day US tour seen by some as preparation for a future Conservative leadership bid.

The Mayor of London's meeting with the former US Secretary of State, the Democrat frontrunner to be the next President, is his highest profile yet in a busy few months of building relationships with international power brokers.

Last night Mr Johnson told The Independent he was "reconciled" to people reading whatever they wanted into his foreign visits but claimed his primary aim was to promote London rather than himself.

The Mayor, who has been eager to demonstrate a more statesmanlike image before the general election, also hopes to visit Japan, Israel and Turkey before the end of his mayoralty in 2016, although this could be difficult to combine with a cabinet post.

He has been selected as Tory candidate for Uxbridge and South Ruislip in the general election, and is expected to be fast-tracked to the front bench.

His aides denied the US trip was deliberately timed to generate maximum coverage just a few months before the general election, claiming it had been years in the planning.

The first part of the tour - which begins in Boston before heading to New York and Washington - could be hit by bad weather. The Boston authorities are advising people to stay at home because of the threat of a severe snow storm.

Last month Mr Johnson flew to meet the Kurdish Prime Minister. He was pictured taking aim with an AK47 alongside Peshmerga soldiers fighting against Isis. Critics in the London Assembly claim he has "mentally checked out" of his mayoral role.

At the end of last year Mr Johnson spent six days in the Far East, visiting Kuala Lumpur, Jakarta and Singapore to meet heads of state, in addition to drumming up business for London. He has already travelled to India, China and the Gulf on official business.

The talks in New York on Wednesday will be the first time Mr Johnson has met Senator Clinton, although he has previously been introduced to her husband, former US President Bill Clinton, as well as to President Obama.

City Hall sources said the pair would discuss the war in Syria and Iraq and the threat posed by Isis to both the region and Western cities. The conversation is almost certain to touch on the general election in May and the US presidential race next year.

Mr Johnson, who was born in New York and has dual citizenship, hopes he could meet Ms Clinton in future as PM. He also met Republican presidential hopefuls Jeb Bush and Chris Christie when they visited the UK recently.

The talks with Ms Clinton were confirmed as the Mayor flew into Boston - and a severe snowstorm - last night on the first day of his whistlestop tour.

Mr Johnson will visit MIT and Harvard in Boston, hold talks with Mayor Bill de Blasio of New York in Manhattan and then go on to attend a Congressional reception being held in Washington, DC.

There will be no shortage of picture opportunities as he meets business tycoons, top scientists, figures from the worlds of theatre and fashion and New York City's police chief "supercop" Bill Bratton.

Mr Johnson will also visit the Smithsonian museum in Washington, which is considering an outpost in London.

His face will crop up on a host of American television networks - including CNN and MSNBC - as well as in major newspapers and at a reception hosted by the British Ambassador in Washington.

CULTURE CLASH

THE NEW YORK COUNTERPART

Over his first five years as Mayor of London, Boris Johnson became firm friends with his New York counterpart Michael Bloomberg, staging joint events where they teased and praised one another in equal measure.

Johnson admired the New York Mayor's business clout and philanthropic instinct, envied his huge wealth and sophistication, and shared his competitive streak and love of publicity.

But when he meets Bloomberg's successor, Bill de Blasio (pictured), it will be a more cautious affair. From different ends of the social and political spectrum, they will harbour suspicions.

To de Blasio, Boris is the privileged champion of business who wants to cut taxes for the wealthy.

Boris sees the New York mayor as a bleeding-heart liberal who wants to tackle inequality by raising taxes on the super-rich and has overseen a schism between City Hall and the NYPD.

Our mayor is an outrageous self-publicist, theirs much more reserved.

But the two politicians also have much in common - both are laid back and personable, with mixed-race families and a socially liberal outlook on life.

And crucially, both men were born in Manhattan in the early 1960s. If the politics stalls, the New Yorker spirit could yet prevail.

Obama's Soft Power Could Force Clinton to Take a Hard Line (National Journal)
By James Oliphant
February 8, 2015
National Journal

President Obama's national security adviser, Susan Rice, outlined a foreign policy blueprint Friday for the president's remaining time in office. It's big on nuance, patience, and team-building, short on near-term solutions—and potentially a headache for the next Democratic presidential nominee.

Rice's remarks, which were part of the rollout of a new formal administration national security policy statement, came at the close of a week in which Obama's strategy for defeating the Islamic State in Iraq and Syria again fell under fierce criticism in the wake of the gruesome staged execution of a Jordanian Air Force pilot.

Beyond reaffirming its alliance with Jordan, the White House treated the incident with a business-as-usual air, insisting that its restrained approach against the Islamic State is paying off. While outrage erupted in Jordan and across the Arab world, Obama and his aides kept cool and stayed the course.

Rice's remarks Friday at the Brookings Institution were very much in keeping with that posture. She admonished the White House's critics at the outset, warning against what she called inside-the-Beltway "alarmism" about the threat posed by IS (as well as by Vladimir Putin's Russia). "What's missing here in D.C. is a sense of perspective," she said.

The Islamic State and other terrorist groups, Rice said, do not pose a threat "of an existential nature" to the United States. Obama had said something similar a week earlier in an interview. (And it seemed somewhat at odds with the picture Obama painted last summer when trying to drum up public support for U.S. intervention.) That dismissiveness is likely to further inflame those who say the administration isn't taking the jihadist threat seriously enough—and it may put Hillary Clinton, should she run for president, in an uncomfortable position.

Where she's been able to, Clinton has subtly—and not necessarily effectively—tried to keep some distance from Obama's foreign policy, an effort hamstrung by her own tenure as the president's secretary of State. The restatement of that policy, which clearly views the the Islamic State as a small part of a very large global picture, may force her to do more in that regard.

The administration may not be doing her any favors in embracing a national security approach, as described by Rice, that de-emphasizes America's military role, encourages the use of the tools of "soft power," such as diplomacy and social media, and plays up coalition-building over going it alone. While it may be a strategy that recognizes, as the White House says, the complexities of the 21st-century world and a war-weary populace, it may be tougher to defend against a GOP presidential nominee certain to take a harder line. Particularly if demonstrable progress against Islamic State hasn't been shown.

The hand-wringing over Obama's approach toward IS largely has been symbolizedby the escalating debate over the president's steadfast refusal to call the fight what critics say it is: a global struggle against radical Islam. Perhaps the most blistering recent critique came from the former head of the Defense Intelligence Agency, Lt. Gen. Michael Flynn, who at a conference in Washington last week blasted the administration's unwillingness to paint the fight in more epic terms.

"You cannot defeat an enemy you do not admit exists," Flynn said, in remarks first reported by The Daily Beast, adding that the Obama administration wants "us to think that our challenge is dealing with an undefined set of violent extremists or merely lone-wolf actors with no ideology or network. But that's just not the straight truth.... Our adversaries around the world are self-described Islamic militants—they say."

Characterizing the stakes in terms like those is exactly what the White House has been trying to avoid. As recently as last weekend, in an interview with CNN's Fareed Zakaria, Obama resisted any suggestion that the U.S. was enmeshed in an ideological conflict. "I think we do ourselves a disservice in this fight if we are not taking into account the fact that the overwhelming majority of Muslims reject this ideology," the president said.

That position, White House aides say, is rooted in a desire to not elevate or legitimize the fever-dream that animates the terrorist group and is central to its recruiting propaganda: that it is fighting in the name of a fundamentalist form of Islam. Another pressing concern has been to avoid antagonizing Muslim communities in the U.S and abroad, where trust and cooperation is necessary to identify potential radical elements, and where the administration can't risk sounding like it's demonizing the religion as a whole.

Even some progressive think tanks believe Obama is being a little too careful. "I understand why they do that, but I do think there is something particular about Islamic extremism that needs to be recognized," says Brian Katulis, a national security analyst at the Center for American Progress. But he adds, "I'm less concerned with how they talk about it, and more concerned about what they do about it."

After the attacks in Paris last month, the French government was not as hesitant. Prime Minister Manuel Valls said that his country "is at war with terrorism, jihadism, and radical Islamism."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton's challenge is that she has, at times, sounded more like Flynn than like Obama. In a speech in Ottawa, Canada late last year, she warned that Islamic State forces were "jihadist" and "expansionary"—an ideological-based enemy determined to take territory. ("Jihadist " is another word Obama won't use.)

"They believe that it is part of their mission to launch attacks, to infiltrate through foreign fighters into Western societies," Clinton said then. "If that were not the case, then we could have a different debate. I think the evidence is convincing, at least to me, that this is a group that will try to pick up where al-Qaida in Afghanistan left off."

This is the same al-Qaida which, in Rice's words Friday, has been "decimated." But Rice also cautioned that "fighting terrorism is a long-term struggle. There will be setbacks. There will be no one-size-fits-all solutions."

In Washington-speak, that means this will all soon be a new president's problem, whether it's Clinton or someone else. But before that happens, Clinton will face new pressure to make clear how she will handle it.

Working Families Party Urges Warren to Run in '16 (NYT)
By Alexander Burns
February 9, 2015
The New York Times

Leaders of New York's Working Families Party on Sunday urged Senator Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts to seek the Democratic nomination for president next year, formally calling on her to enter the 2016 race for the White House.

By voting to encourage a Warren candidacy, the Working Families Party became the latest liberal group to support her as a potential primary challenger to former Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton, who has not formally announced that she will seek the Democratic nomination but is the presumed favorite.

Several organizations on the left, led by MoveOn.org and Democracy for America, have already organized a campaign designed to lure Ms. Warren, with her brand of economic populism, into making a bid for the presidency.

"We know a champion for working families when we see one," Bill Lipton, New York State director of the Working Families Party, said. "The only thing better than watching Elizabeth Warren take Wall Street to task from the Senate would be helping her bring our issues to the center of the national debate."

Ms. Warren, who is beloved among liberals as a fierce critic of what she sees as the abuses of the financial industry, has repeatedly ruled out running for president in 2016. Lacey Rose, a spokeswoman for the senator, reiterated that stance in an email on Sunday. "As Senator Warren has said many times, she is not running for president and doesn't support these draft campaigns," Ms. Rose wrote.

The Working Families Party, led by a coalition of activists, liberal advocacy groups and labor unions, deliberated on an early-evening conference call before voting to encourage Ms. Warren to join the campaign. Party officials declined to share the tally of the vote.

The pro-Warren vote comes at a potentially awkward moment for New York Democrats, who have sought to draw their party's 2016 presidential nominating convention to New York City. Mayor Bill de Blasio has aggressively promoted the bid on the national stage, where Democrats aligned with Mrs. Clinton hold powerful sway.

Although Mr. de Blasio has a longstanding relationship with the Working Families Party, party officials said that neither the mayor nor his staff had played a role in the group's deliberations involving Ms. Warren.

Several Working Families leaders stressed that the vote was not meant as a rejection of Mrs. Clinton, who twice earned the party's endorsement as a candidate for the United States Senate.

"It's a vote in the context of two undeclared candidates for president," said Ed Ott, former head of the New York City Central Labor Council. "What the Warren vote reflects is that people want a Democratic Party with a spine."

Javier Valdes, executive director of Make the Road Action Fund, a Latino-oriented liberal group, characterized the vote as a statement of enthusiasm for a competitive primary. "Secretary Clinton has had a strong track record with our community and what we really want here is a strong debate about Democratic values and working family values," Mr. Valdes, a Working Families Party leader, said.

Hillary vs. Warren would split Hollywood (Hill)
By Judy Kurtz
February 9, 2015
The Hill

A battle between Hillary Clinton and Sen. Elizabeth Warren could easily divide entertainers, creating a showdown that might split Hollywood and force A-list stars to choose sides.

The lines are already being drawn in the fight for La La Land's love, with the former secretary of State not yet officially in the 2016 Democratic presidential race and the Massachusetts Democrat professing a lack of interest.
"They draw on different parts of the artistic community," Darrell West, author of the book "Celebrity Politics," tells ITK. "Warren, being more liberal, does very well among progressive artists, various Hollywood stars who worry the Democratic Party has become too centrist."

Entertainers including Susan Sarandon, Olivia Wilde, Edward Norton and Mark Ruffalo have all signed on to support Warren. Celebs in the 65-year-old lawmaker's camp, West says, welcome her "populist rhetoric."

After banding together to form a group called "Artists for Warren," more than 90 performers penned an open letter last week urging the freshman senator to make a White House bid.

"Senator Warren, we're ready to show you that you have the support needed to enter this presidential race," the message stated, which was signed by celebrities including "Fahrenheit 9/11" director Michael Moore, "Big Love's" Chloe Sevigny, Julia Stiles and Natasha Lyonne, among others.

"There are a lot of people in grassroots organizations pushing for Senator Warren to run in 2016. This same sentiment exists in the Hollywood community," Kathryn Cramer Brownell, an assistant professor of history at Purdue University said.

In a video posted on Vanity Fair's website, "Firecatcher" and "The Avengers" star Ruffalo lauded Warren, saying, "She's someone that gets the progressive values that I believe we all share." He added, "We don't know that she's going to run, so we're sort of taking a leap of faith. But that's the only way to really implement the changes that need to be changed in the world today."

Clinton, however, generally appeals to a different type of Hollywood heavyweight, says West, the Brookings Institution's vice president and director of governance studies. "I think with Hillary Clinton, she attracts celebrities who are more pragmatic and are interested in winning, regardless of what the political message is," he added.

Some of Hollywood's biggest A-listers have said they'd buy a ticket to see Clinton storm the 2016 campaign box office. Music chart topper Katy Perry, George Clooney, big-time Democratic donor Barbra Streisand, "Happy" singer Pharrell Williams, Eva Longoria, Ashley Judd, and Elton John have all expressed support for the former first lady.

Longoria, a 2012 Obama campaign co-chairwoman, said as far back as 2013 that she would "absolutely" campaign for Clinton in the next race for the White House. "Lord of the Rings" actress Liv Tyler rooted Clinton on during a 2014 fashion shoot, donning a "Hillary for President" t-shirt in a series of glam images.

Brownell, the author of the recently released "Showbiz Politics: Hollywood in American Politics," says it'll be "fascinating" to see how Clinton uses her celeb cache. "I think Hillary Clinton is really a political celebrity herself," she said. "I think that Hollywood celebrities will be key in fundraising for her, using entertainment events to help raise a lot of money."

"The Clintons have been around for 20 years so they've had plenty of opportunities to cultivate artists and actors. So they're basically getting the pragmatic problem-solvers," West says.

Although Clinton, 67, is a veteran of the political arena, Brownell says Warren — who has repeatedly denied she'll be throwing her hat in the presidential ring in 2016 — may actually come out on top in terms of the number of Hollywood-types showing her the love. Having "prominent people to urge her to run created a groundswell of enthusiasm and support" for the former lawyer and professor, says Brownell. "I think celebrities would play a more prominent place in her campaign to generate excitement surrounding the potential of her candidacy."

And while there's a danger of appearing "too Hollywood," West says if Warren or Clinton were to run, they would likely embrace the entertainers who are publicly cheering them on.

"They provide credibility especially early in a campaign. It's a way to demonstrate that your campaign is able to attract famous people," says West. "It's the age of celebrity in which we live, so having star power is part of contemporary politics."

Bernie Sanders steps up: I am not Hillary, 'trust me' (MSNBC)
By Alex Seitz-Wald
February 9, 2015
MSNBC

HARRISBURG, Penn. – Organizers with Keystone Progress invited Hillary Clinton, Martin O'Malley, Elizabeth Warren, and Bernie Sanders to speak at the annual conference here this weekend. Sanders showed up.

The Independent senator from Vermont is actively considering a presidential run in 2016, and hopes to tap into progressive grassroots networks like this one for a potential underdog challenge to all-but-declared Democratic frontrunner Clinton.

The desire for an alternative to Clinton was clear among the 800 rank-and-file activists, labor organizers, and local elected officials here. But he's stuck between Clinton on one hand and Warren on the other, who so far tops many progressives' fantasy draft presidential ticket.

"Hillary Clinton doesn't come up in our conversations as being a progressive," said Franklin Country Democratic Party Chair Sheri Morgan, who was manning the Progressive Democrats of America booth offering "Run, Bernie, Run" swag.

Sanders himself promised "real differences" with Clinton in an interview with msnbc's Steve Kornacki before his keynote speech Saturday. "Trust me, there will be a real clash of ideas," he said.

Maria Payan, who volunteered for both Obama presidential campaigns, ran up to Sanders as he left the interview and pressed a check into his hand. "I want to help with your campaign anyway I can," she said.

Payan said she likes Warren too, and the idea of woman president, but like others here, preferred Sanders at the top of a progressive dream ticket since she thought Sanders has more experience in government. "People are looking that alternative," she explained

Sanders will need a lot more checks if he hopes to imitate Obama – at least $50 million worth, according to his advisors – but he's been slow to build a fundraising or political operation. Two staffers accompanied Sanders to the event, his Senate communications director and the director of his PAC, and collected names and contact info from supporters.

In the absence of a formal campaign infrastructure, he's found allies in existing local groups, like the the Iowa Citizen Action Network in the key presidential state and Keystone Progress here. Sanders trails Clinton by well over 50 percentage points in early polls, garnering an average of just 3.4% in recent surveys. Warren, who has repeatedly said she is not running for president, has more support at 11%.

And it's still unclear whether Sanders has the stomach for a run. He despises what he calls the "game" aspects of politics, like fundraising and building a personality cult. "What is politics? What is serious politics?" he asked Saturday. "It's about having a serious debate about issues, not gossip, not personality."

Peter Deutsch, a retired Penn State physics professor, also liked the idea of a Sanders-Warren ticket. "To put it bluntly, no one is challenging the establishment, specifically Hillary Clinton," he said.

Inside the ballroom at the Hilton, where Sanders would receive four standing ovations during his speech, Keystone Progress chairman Ritchie Tabachnick called Sanders "the voice of the American conscious."

In his Brooklyn brogue, the senator gave a version of the stump speech he's been testing out on recent visits to Iowa and New Hampshire. It gets gloomy at times. "Now, I know that you think the situation is bad. In fact it's worse than you think," he said.

Nonetheless, the crowd encouraged him to press on when his time is up, whooping at every rhetorical barb against the Koch Brothers, and gasping at statistics about the accumulation of wealth in the top 1%.

Billionaires and "counterrevolutionaries," he explained, have "psychiatric issues" – they're "addicted to money." "We all know people who are addicted to alcohol or drugs; these people are addicted to money," Sanders said.

The result is a "philosophical war being waged against the middle-class and working families."

The solution is a "political revolution," but one that looks backwards, not forward, to a time when "one person could work 40 hours a week and make enough to take care for the entire family."

Sanders' agenda, which he'll lay out in more detail Monday at the Brookings Institution in Washington, may not be particularly radical, but his rhetoric is, and it's a message these activists seemed eager to hear.

"I like Bernie Sanders, I think he's sexy," said Maggie Henry, an organic farmer who says her Western Pennsylvania business was destroyed by nearby fracking.

Bob Pyle, a pastor in the Brethren Chuck in Snyder, voted for Ron Paul in the Republican primary in both 2008 and 2012, before voting for Obama and in general, said he likes Sanders because he's anti-establishment and anti-war.

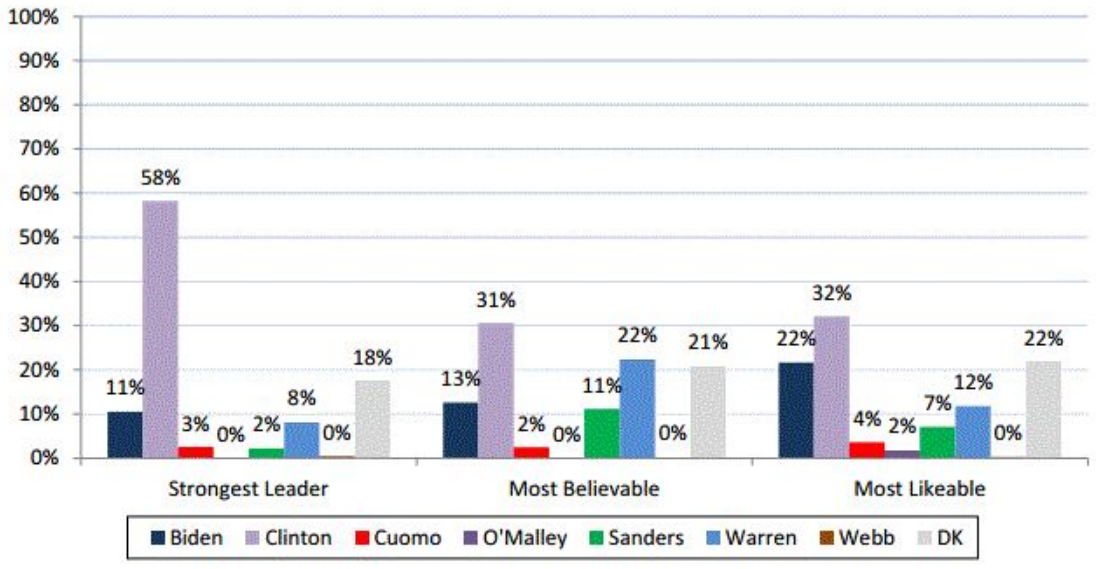
Sanders' most immediate challenge in presidential politics, however, is not the Koch Brothers, but Warren, who has so far sucked up much of the organizational energy on the left despite giving zero indication that she's running for president.

Advisors to Sanders think progressives will ultimately come around to Sanders if and when Warren doesn't run. Michael Morrill, the executive director of Keystone Progress, agreed, "People will coalesce around a progressive candidate, whoever that is."

But activists hoping to draft Warren don't have any immediate plans to cease their efforts and throw their support behind Sanders in the event that Warren doesn't get in. Jim Dean, a fellow Vermonter, warmly introduced Sanders before the keynote address, but he runs a group, Democracy for America, that's trying to draft Warren. His brother, former Gov. Howard Dean, supports Clinton and hosted a fundraiser for the pro-Clinton super PAC Ready for Hillary last week.

"I'd love for Sanders to run," Dean said in an interview. But members of his group, which has long branded itself as representing the "Warren-wing of the Democratic party," voted overwhelming to support Warren in 2016.

Would DFA support Sanders if it becomes clear Warren isn't running? "We're not spending a lot of time gaming out what we're going to do 8 months or whatever from now," he replied, noting that about as many DFA members voted for Clinton as voted for Sanders.



When Rick Smith started his progressive talk radio show ten years ago, his very first guest was then-Rep. Bernie Sanders. Now, Smith's show is aired on affiliates on across Pennsylvania, and he says Sanders "has been right about everything" since they first talked.

"Warren says that she's going to stay out and that's the right choice," Smith said. "Bernie is the right guy at the right time."

But without prompting, Smith continued, "Can he win. Eh."

Candidate Qualities

A majority of likely primary voters (58%) view Hillary Clinton as the strongest leader in the field. Nearly a third (31%) of likely voters view Clinton as the most believable followed by Warren at 22% and Biden at 13%. Thirty-two percent (32%) say Clinton is the most likeable candidate followed by Joe Biden at 22%.

-- Chris Stirewalt comments on significance of Tennessee shooting for the 2016 race. Says President Obama and the Democratic Party face a test as to whether or not they will name radical Islam as the motivation for this incident. Stirewalt says the Democratic base won't like this as much as some Republicans didn't like their leaders calling for the confederate flag to be taken down. Says if Obama and the Democratic Party want to keep the White House with the presumptive nominee of Hillary Clinton, they need to name the name of radical Islam being responsible. Says if they don't, they won't have the trust of the general electorate and HRC won't be president. Says she has turned far left and misread the American people. Says people want to return to prosperity and her plan won't lead to that. Says she will be the Democratic nominee, but 400 staffers and a couple of billion dollars won't get her into the White House if her policies mean debt, division, and stagnation. Says liberals and progressives are energized by Sanders while HRC has the biggest organization in Iowa. -- Comments on HRC profit sharing speech. Charlie Gasparino says HRC said she's against quarterly capitalism and short-termism. Says Blackrock executives and the campaign are saying that speech was inspired by Larry Fink who has been going off on his own campaign trail against activist investing and short termism. Points out that Larry Fink has key Clinton advisor Cheryl Mills on his board and sources say Fink wants to be HRC's treasury secretary if she becomes president. Gasparino says if you look at HRC's profit sharing speech, it comes right out of Larry Fink's playbook. Says he hears from people that Fink probably played a role in advising on that speech. Cavuto: Coast to Coast . 2015 07 17,Hillary Clinton,Commentary,National,Role of Larry Fink in HRC speech.mp4

-- Report that HRC is raising the most money on the Democrat side, but Bernie Sanders is wining in terms of grassroots engagement. Reports that Bernie Sanders has had 284,000 donate to his campaign while HRC has had just over 250,000. Mercedes Schlapp weighs in and says you have HRC building her campaign from the top down while Bernie Sanders' is more organic and social media/grassroots driven. Says it's help to have a lot of grassroots donors, but says it will take more than small donors to beat the monstrous HRC. David Mercer weighs in and says Bernie is different than Obama because Bernie has 75% coming from small donors whereas Obama in 2008 had a strategic mix of donors. Says HRC also has a strategic mix and she raised $8 million in $200 or less increments. Says she's got campaign workers in 50 states and has an organization that is speaking to the American public. Schlapp disagrees and says HRC is not speaking to the American public since her favorability ratings are dropping. Says only 30% of people think HRC is compassionate and only 39% think she's honest. Says this will be a problem for HRC in the general election.Mercer says HRC identifies and relates to people on the issues. Says she is outpolling every Republican on every issues as well as favorability and 17/18 times has been voted the most admired woman in the world. Schlapp says HRC was stonewalled and couldn't connect in her CNN interview and if she keeps giving those kinds of performances she will be in big trouble. Cavuto: Coast to Coast .2015 07 17,Hillary Clinton,Commentary,National,Discussion of HRC campaign success.mp4

-- Report of all Democrat candidates to speak at the Iowa Democratic Party's Hall of Fame dinner tonight. Alex Seitz Wald reports live from Iowa and says for a lot of these candidates, it will be the first time for them to introduce themselves to Iowa voters. Gretchen Carlson says Trump creates a conundrum not only for the other Republicans, but HRC as well. Says if you imagine the two of them on a debate stage, HRC has been a politician forever and ever and Trump is not a politician. Alan Colmes says there is no way Trump will get the nomination. Market Makers . 2015 07 17,Hillary Clinton,Commentary,National,Obama favorability could help HRC win votes.mp4

-- Coverage of Jeb Bush taking an Uber to an event. Says the move comes a few days after HRC took a more critical stance on companies such as Uber because she said they raise questions about workplace protections. Shows clip of Jeb Bush saying that these people are quite happy and if they are breaking legitimate law along the way, such as exploiting workers, there's way to address it, but the fact is this is disrupting world order. Host says New York mayor is now trying to regulate the economy. Guest says HRC sounded like she was giving an old world answer and this is inevitable and we need to figure out how to manage it into the new economy. Says it's dangerous for the Democrats to be going against the tech industry because they are traditionally supportive of Democrats but the sharing industry could be a lightning rod in the 2016 election. Squawk Alley . 2015 07 17,Hillary Clinton;Jeb Bush,Commentary,National,Uber as 2016 lightning rod.mp4

-- Report on Uber as a big 2016 issue. Shows coverage of Jeb Bush taking an Uber to an event yesterday. Reports that Republicans are in favor of keeping Uber unregulated while Democrats like HRC are concerned about what the industry will look like if allowed to go unregulated. Shows clip of HRC saying the sharing economy raises hard questions about workplace protections and what a good job will look like in the future. Mike Pesca says HRC seems to be hemming and hawing a little but Uber is a good thing and it's not perfect, but it shouldn't be something that we're attacking. Heidi Moore says Uber needs to prove that it can operate ethically, but it's not necessarily worse than other companies in corporate America that mistreat their workers. Guest says HRC is doing fine by her base by saying this raises questions about work even if it will irk people who love Uber. Alex Wagner says there are real questions around Uber that are worthy of debate, but we are not going to really get that. NOW with Alex Wagner . 2015 07 17,Hillary Clinton;Jeb Bush,Commentary,National,Uber in the 2016 election.mp4

Hillary Clinton, ponte las pilas. Because Donald Trump cannot be President… So Donald Trump, for all the Latinos outside (the US), always upwards and onwards. And Trump, be careful with El Chapo!" The poll by Bendixen and Amandi revealed that over 6 in 10 Hispanic voters prefer Clinton to be the next President, with 64% saying they would vote for HRC and in contrast to 27% that would vote for Jeb Bush if the election were today between those two candidates. If the election were between HRC and Trump, HRC would win with 70% of the vote. Additionally, last year a poll showed that 34% of registered Hispanic voters in the US said that they would vote for a Democrat, regardless of the candidate. the Latino population tends to support Democrats. One news anchor says that the matchup between HRC and Trump would interesting to imagine in a general election race. -- Analysis of HRC's and Republican candidates' positions on immigration. Analysis of political news in DC with Telemundo's political pundit/analyst, starting with saying that Donald Trump's comments may help him in the debate and have obviously resonated with at least a segment of the GOP. Says that the difference between Jeb Bush and Trump is just 3%in a recent poll, which is within the margin of error so there's really a tie between Trump and Bush. Political analyst says that "we have a big opportunity" because usually we (Latinos) just compare between the Republican and the Democrat, but now we can compare the position on immigration of all the Republican candidates to see what the party offers in those different opinions. Anchor then turns to HRC "sending a message to Trump in Spanish" by saying "Basta!" and asks if HRC is doing it to try to get immigrants' support. Analyst says that HRC "has been pursuing the Latino vote for months." Publicly, she is the candidate with the most robust, public plan on immigration as of now because it includes a path to citizenship and continuing DACA and DAPA (and even expanding it). Subject: Conversation with Ashton Carter

Colleagues & Friends,

After being grilled for nearly four hours by the House Armed Services Committee, many government officials would be forgiven for wanting to have a stiff drink and head home. Not Secretary of Defense Ashton Carter. My friend and former colleague hustled up to Harvard Kennedy School after his testimony yesterday to meet and talk with students and share big ideas about global security in a JFK Jr. Forum last night.

Dec. 1. 2015 – Secretary of Defense Ashton Carter (R) in conversation with Belfer Center Director Graham Allison at Harvard Kennedy School. (Martha Stewart)

From biotechnology in Boston and talent retention at the Pentagon to ISIL, Russia, and China, Ash covered a wide range of topics in 60 minutes. Among his many insightful remarks, I wanted to share these zingers:

On ISIL:
"The objective there will be to take out ISIL leadership, to capture ISIL leadership, to rescue hostages as we've done…and to make ISIL wonder…when they go to bed at night, who's going to be coming in the window?"

On Russia's Involvement in Syria:
"They've been striking the people who are in the opposition who … need to be part of the future of Syria. They should be striking ISIL. So it's backwards… We can't associate ourselves with what they're doing now because it's doomed to fail."

On China and the Asia-Pacific:
"This is the single region of the world … which will be of greatest consequence to our nation's future. And I say that for the very simple reason it's where half of humanity lives. It's where half of the economic activity of the globe is. And so keeping peace and stability there is a very important thing to do."

On Violent Extremism:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I think the question of violent extremism is with us to stay. And I don't mean ISIL. I do believe we will defeat ISIL. But if you ask is – are people who's job is like mine is to worry about protecting our people, will we long worry about violent extremism?
My prediction is yes, we will. Because destructive power of greater and greater magnitude falls into the hands of smaller and smaller groups of human beings."

Subject: [big campaign] Media Monitoring Report - Morning 07/24/08

Main Topics: Obama in Berlin, McCain campaign missteps, Topical Storm Dolly

Summary: In order to steal attention away from Senator Obama, the McCain campaign's two-pronged strategy of (1) accusing the media of bias, and (2) staging high profile media stunts, appears to be working. However, the coverage is trending increasingly negative. This morning, the major networks made note of the flopped oilrig appearance scheduled for today, mentioning bad weather for the cancellation. Though they did not connect the two, the networks did cover the large oil spill nearby the planned event. As Obama was portrayed in clips appearing as a head of state shaking hands with Israeli and Palestinian leaders, McCain was shown in front of a grocery shelf of cheese and riding with the former President Bush in a golf cart (placed together, McCain looked older than Bush). Cable networks revisited the surge-Anbar Awakening timeline controversy, the vitriolic nature of McCain's "rather lose a war" attack on Obama, the twisting of Obama's 'never again' statement, and the overall desperate state of the McCain campaign. Although tropical storm Dolly and Obama's visit to Berlin were the main focus of much of the news today, a new WSJ/NBC poll, the minimum wage increase, and the Housing Bill were among the bigger stories. Discussing the fact that Novak hit a pedestrian yesterday, Jon Stewart made an astute observation: "The only difference, really, between this and the rest of his career is that this time, someone stopped him."

McCain Attacks Obama on Foreign Policy, Talks About VP Selection (FNC 07/23/08 9:15pm)
SEAN HANNITY: I want to stay on foreign policy for just a second here. I did notice he, at one time, said we're air-raiding villages and killing civilians, talking about Afghanistan. He once said it would be a profound mistake under any circumstances to use nuclear weapons. He once talked about invading an ally, Pakistan. He once referred to Iran, Cuba, and Venezuela, they're tiny countries, they're not a serious threat, and then he said -- although he's changed as of today -- the issue of Ahmadinejad that he would meet without preconditions.

JOHN MCCAIN: All I can say is that Senator Obama does not have any background on these issues, and I would hope that he would do his best to learn. One of the reasons why I encouraged him to go to Iraq. I didn't know he would issue a policy statement the day before he left, but I think the American people are most concerned about our economy, that I know we're going to talk about, and gas prices, but they also want the peace. I can win the peace. I know how to win wars. I hate wars. No one understands war and the tragedy of it better than the veteran who feels the keen loss of a comrade, so -- most keenly the loss of a comrade. And so I believe that American people will take that in to consideration, and, frankly, they will take into consideration Senator Obama's judgment about Iraq and the brave young men and women to not applaud their success and their strategy. I think, frankly, Americans don't agree with him.

HANNITY: We'll move on for just a second. Reports that you are close to choosing your vice president. Is that true?

MCCAIN: We have said exactly the same thing all along, as you know, Sean, that we'll make the decision when we make it. The obvious impact of mentioning somebody's name or where we are would cause a flurry of speculation.

HANNITY: I think this would be the perfect time by the way.

MCCAIN: I think this would be a good show to make that announcement.

HANNITY: I'll take that as a promise if you want to offer it. But -- well, first of all, had -- you've obviously been looking very closely.

MCCAIN: Yes.

HANNITY: A lot of names have been mentioned. Bobby Jindal said today that he wanted to take his name out of the running as I'm sure you're aware of. He did mention, and I think it got a lot of news of some comments you made about Governor Pawlenty. Mitt Romney's name has been mentioned a lot. How many can you -- first of all, have you made a final decision?

MCCAIN: No.

HANNITY: How many contenders are there?

MCCAIN: Sean, I can't do that.

HANNITY: No?

MCCAIN: Look, I love you, but I can't do that.

HANNITY: Are there four, five?

MCCAIN: . to go down that slippery slope -- 400.

HANNITY: 400. Well, by the way, anyone whose name is mentioned, we get on the show and we ask if they're being vetted.

[. . .]

What are you -- all right, then what are you looking for in a vice president?

MCCAIN: Someone who shares your priorities, your principles, your values, and I've got to also say priorities. One of the toughest decisions a president makes is setting priorities, and so that has to be -- those obviously important characteristics, and one of them, of course, is someone who can take your place immediately. That's maybe viewed by some as even more important in my case.

HANNITY: Well, OK. Is age an issue?

MCCAIN: Sure. It was in the primaries. It will be an issue, and that's why I have to go out there and do what I've done for a long, long time. Campaign hard, show I'm capable of 24/7, and convince the American people that I am most qualified.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

HANNITY: You've got to use one of those Reagan lines that you're not going to allow your opponent's youth and inexperience to be a factor in this campaign?

MCCAIN: I've stolen many lines from President Reagan, and I'd be glad to steal that one. But I want to convince the American people that I can inspire a generation of Americans to serve a cause greater than their self-interests. Right now, as you well know and our viewers know, trust and confidence in Washington is at its lowest level, 9 percent approval rating of Congress. Complete gridlock. 84 percent of the American people think the country's on the wrong track. We've got to inspire them again and show them that America's best days are ahead of us which is something I profoundly believe.

McCain Uninterested in Lack of Media Coverage: "It is What it Is" (FNC 07/23/08 9:05pm)

SEAN HANNITY: . . .first question is, how many times have you been to Iraq and Afghanistan?

JOHN MCCAIN: Eight times and several times to Afghanistan, as well, and I've tried to go periodically.

[. . .]

HANNITY: And how many times has Katie Couric, and Charlie Gibson, and Brian Williams been with you?

MCCAIN: Not often, but it is what it is.

HANNITY: Well, let me ask you about that, because this is Barack Obama . . . and the three major networks and their big stars out there to cover this. Does that bother you at all? Is that -- what do you think of that? Is that media bias?

MCCAIN: No, but, you know, one of the things that's very interesting, he had never before asked to sit down and get a briefing from General Petraeus. I mean -- and the other thing I thought was interesting, he issued his policy statement towards Iraq and Afghanistan, which as you mentioned never been to, before he left. Now, I've got to tell you, Sean. I've traveled around the world, usually at your expense.

MCCAIN: . . . but I make my policy statements and speeches after I've learned along the way, so it's pretty clear that Senator Obama was not going to change his wrong view that the surge had not succeeded . . .

HANNITY: Well, he -- actually up until the week before he had on his Web site that the surge wasn't working, and then they purged that part of it . . . is that just a political posture?

MCCAIN: No rational person who was in Iraq two years ago and saw the situation . . . cannot say that the surge has succeeded, and there's one other thing about this . . .

HANNITY: You had some very strong things to say in the last couple of days as it relates to this and to Senator Barack Obama . . . you said, if he had his way, we would have . . . and then you went on to say, I would rather lose a political campaign than lose a war. But Obama would rather lose a war than a political campaign.

MCCAIN: But let me say again, this surge -- as you know, I supported it when it wasn't popular. I was even called by Republicans for being disloyal because I fought against the failed strategy of nearly four years. And as you also well recall, there were times when my campaign was declared dead and buried.

HANNITY: I remember, one summer.

MCCAIN: But I did what I thought was right for the -- I knew was right for the country . . . Senator Obama railed against, fought against, he wants -- he voted to cut off funding for the troops in Iraq, and still will not acknowledge that the surge has succeeded . . .

MCCAIN: So it's clear to me that there must be political calculations in his judgment because no rational observer could conclude anything else.

HANNITY: . . . .he goes on this trip with a predetermined outcome in terms of where his position is going to be. What does that mean to you in terms of his qualifications to be the commander in chief and the next president?

MCCAIN: Well, let me point out that also his -- during the primaries if we'd have done what he'd wanted to do, the troops would have been out last March . . . We'd have never given the surge a chance to succeed. The thing that disturbs me is we know that Afghanistan is a major challenge, but the same strategy that succeeded in Iraq has to be employed in Afghanistan . . . If he refuses to acknowledge that it's succeeded in Iraq, what would be his plans for Afghanistan which is a very complex and difficult challenge?

HANNITY: . . . I want to go back to the media question here for just a second . . . You wanted to have your op-ed published in the New York Times. It was rejected . . . Now I've been saying, and my audience knows I'm conservative, we may look at 2008 as the year that journalism died in America . . . What does that mean in terms of media coverage in this campaign? I know you're laughing, but--

MCCAIN: . . . you know very well that if anybody complains, then, you know, that's just non-productive. I'm happy with where our campaign is. We are very close in the polls. I'm happy with how we've been doing. I look forward the convention and the two months following. I'm convinced we can win this race. I'm the underdog, I've got a lot of work to do, but I'm proud of our campaign, and I'm convinced that we can get direct to the American people.

McCain Agrees That An Energy War is a "Clear and Present Danger" (FNC 07/23/08 9:30pm)
SEAN HANNITY: . . . I've even argued that we have a clear and present danger facing the United States, the possibility of an energy war. Am I overstating the case?

JOHN MCCAIN: No. We are sending $700 billion a year overseas to countries that don't like us very much. Some of that money ends up in the hands of terrorist organizations . . . You are exactly on the mark, and I think Americans are beginning to figure it out. Of course we have to drill offshore. Of course, we have to exploit every means we have of bridging this gap while we make the transition to energy independence. I viewed a new automobile the other day called the Volt. I pray it succeeds . . .The French can build a nuclear power plant in five years. We should build 45 nuclear power plants by 2030, and that will create 700,000 jobs, and it's clean. Senator Obama opposes offshore drilling, he opposes nuclear, he opposes -- gas tax holiday, he opposes giving an award for a real battery- driven car. So he's Dr. No.

HANNITY: And coal.

MCCAIN: Yes, and coal. And we've got to invest $200 billion a year in pure research and development in clean coal technology. We are sitting on the world's largest supply of energy in the form of coal reserves. We've got to have clean coal technology.

HANNITY: You have come under some scrutiny and criticism because you changed your position on offshore drilling, and my question to you is would you consider changing that position on ANWR? . . . Do you think you'd reconsider in light of the high price of gas?

MCCAIN: I will look at everything . . . I've always said that it's left up to the states. It's still left up to the states, but it is also important as far as the price of a barrel of oil is concerned. You know when the president made the announcement that we were going to lift the federal moratorium, which wasn't that big a deal, the price of oil dropped $10 a gallon . . .

HANNITY: A barrel.

MCCAIN: Excuse -- $10 a barrel. And the people that said that we couldn't affect the price of a barrel of oil were wrong . . .

[. . .]

MCCAIN: . . . it will matter as far as the price of a barrel of oil is concerned, my friend, and I'm confident that an oil executives say, and I hope you'll have one on your program.

HANNITY: Yes.

MCCAIN: . . . they're telling me that we could get some of this oil within a year or two. That's not -- it's not this 10 year, you know.

[. . .]

MCCAIN: . . . When you say to an audience I think we have to drill offshore and exploit our resources there, they stand and applaud. They get it. American people -- sometimes we don't give them quite as much credit as they deserve for knowing what's going on . . .

HANNITY: . . . There's been a lot made about your opponent's, let's say, shifting positions . . . many -- most of the major issues that he ran on . . . now shifted fairly dramatically. So my question to you is, what does that say to you about Barack Obama as a person, about miss character, about who he is?

MCCAIN: I think the American people want straight talk . . . I've got to stick to my positions, and I will, and I know that some of them aren't popular, but at least Americans right now say, look, I may not agree with this guy, but at least I know where he's coming from.

HANNITY: What about the radical associations? We spent a lot of time. Reverend Wright, Tony Rezko, William Ayers, Father Pfleger. We've discussed a lot of these associations in detail. When you couple that with maybe those comments he made in San Francisco when he used the term bitter Americans, in Pennsylvania, clinging to their guns, religion, with antipathy to those who aren't like them, does that reveal a lot about Senator Obama, his judgment? You've been -- you seemed reluctant to bring these things up.

MCCAIN: Well, first of all, in the case of Mr. Ayers, anybody who said that he's sorry that he didn't bomb more, and in that kind of a close relationship, that kind of person I think has to be rejected. I think also that we want to campaign as much in a most respectful fashion . . . But I think that Americans care very much about what we're going to do for them . . . right now they're hurting very badly, as you know, and they want a concrete set of proposals, for example, for energy independence . . .

Giuliani Attacks Barack on Foreign Policy (FNC 07/24/08 7:27am)
GRETCHEN CARLSON: . . . let me ask you this because earlier in the show we were talking about a comment that Senator Obama made while he was on the airplane with reporters yesterday with regard to what the troops choose to watch . . . he implied that it's mandated by the Bush administration that they watch Fox News . . . it, in fact, would be a choice for the troops, would it not?

RUDY GIULIANI: Of course it would be a choice. And I'm surprised that Barack Obama is surprised about that. I mean, if he has any understanding of how American troops think, it would be natural that a large percentage of them would watch Fox. The sense is that Fox covers the war in Iraq and the situation in Iraq in a more balanced way . . . a very large percentage of them believe they get a better shake on Fox than some of the other networks some of which I think they believe is anti-military . . .

BRIAN KILMEADE: Mr. Mayor, you know this personally that John McCain's candidacy was almost destroyed because of the support for Iraq, for the support for the surge, for criticizing the administration he lost a lot of Republican support. Here is a time where the surge has worked . . . but, yet, is he not able to take a bow because he is almost caught on the defensive because of Barack Obama going over there, showing his charismatic way . . . how do you get on the offensive if you are Senator McCain in a situation where he clearly deserves it?

GIULIANI: I think it's a question of style over substance. Say to the American people, what do you want? Style? That's all Obama is offering. . . John McCain is real. I mean, John McCain came up and helped to come up with the idea of the surge. Supported it when it wasn't very popular. The surge has now worked. That's the kind of perch that I think the American people want. They want a person of substance. The person who can really do things. not be a good actor on television which is what Barack Obama has shown.

CARLSON: At some point, Mr. Mayor, John McCain is going to have to put out advertisements That attack Barack Obama Barack Obama get attention back to his side.

GIULIANI: I'm sure contrasting the lack of experience of Barack Obama, which is astounding when you consider he is running for President of the United States . . . and it's underlined by the fact that this is his first trip to Germany. It is a presidential candidate who is going there for the first time. Not with the really deep knowledge of the world. John McCain, on the other hand, is probably one of the most knowledgeable people about the world. . .

Highlight #5
Rove: The Left Shouldn't Talk About McCain's Anbar Gaffe Because Then You Have to Bring Up All of Obama's Mistakes (FNC 07/23/08 9:54pm)
ALAN COLMES: That was Senator Barack Obama on the CBS Evening News with Katie Couric. She didn't think, apparently, he was giving a straight answer -- I do -- about the surge in Iraq. For reaction we continue with FOX News contributor Karl Rove. CBS actually took out an answer that John McCain gave about the surge, which turned out to be wrong, when John McCain said the surge -- because of that we were able to go out and protect the sheik and others and it began the Anbar awakening. But he got the timeline wrong. The Anbar awakening happened first and that helped what happened afterwards, including -- and CBS refused to air that.

ROVE: Well, Alan, first of all, let's not get into sort of nit-nat mistakes. After all, Barack Obama said we need more Arabic translators in Afghanistan. They don't speak Arabic in Afghanistan. He said yesterday Israel is Israel's greatest friend. He talked earlier about visiting 57 states.

COLMES: What about his time line being wrong on the Anbar awakening?

ROVE: Look, let's not get into this.

COLMES: Why not?

ROVE: You've got a guy who said earlier, and contrary to what Congressman Adam Smith said, with all due respect to Congressman Smith, if -- Sean is right. Barack Obama said that our troops in Afghanistan were just air-raiding villages and killing civilians. If you want to talk about mistakes and misstatements...

[. . .]

COLMES: ... but you're not responding to what John McCain said which was actually wrong...

ROVE: I'd be happy to...

COLMES: It was left out of the CBS piece.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

ROVE: Alan -- Alan, I'd be happy to respond if you like. Would you like me to respond?

COLMES: Yes.

ROVE: OK. My point is, is that, look, he had his timing wrong. You're right. But don't make a big deal of it, because if you do, you're going to then have to make a big deal of all of the misstatements by Barack Obama. Today...

COLMES: You'll do that for me.

HANNITY: Karl, I want to get your thoughts on the media bias, and that is that, you know, John McCain's been there eight times. And we don't have the big three network anchors, the stars going with him. The New York Times, they publish Obama's op-ed, but not Senator McCain's. And I want your overall take on the trip abroad in general.

ROVE: Well, look, first of all, I do think there is a bias here that's coming out. If you want the numbers, the hard numbers, take a look at the Pew Charitable Trust numbers on the coverage. Since February 4 was the last week when there was roughly equal coverage to Barack Obama, Hillary Clinton and John McCain . . . you're right: it is fundamentally unfair that, when John McCain went on a world tour, none of the world anchors, none of the news network anchors followed him. And on this one they are . . .

Former McCain Campaign Adviser Mike Murphy Credits Hurricane For Saving McCain From Oil Spill Disaster (MSNBC 07/24/08)
MIKE MURPHY: I actually think the McCain campaign got freakishly lucky on the hurricane because with the oil spill, had they done it, had the weather been good, McCain would have been on a oil platform, we would have been looking at footage of oil floating around. Would have been even worse. So it's the first time I know in recent history that hurricane saves candidate from second photo op disaster in one week. So it's been tough for him.

Jon Stewart Mocks McCain's Visit to Maine, Looks Older Than First George Bush (COMEDY 07/23/08)
STEWART: And while McCain might not be meeting with any current world leaders, he's still meeting with people like, you know, former Presidents. At their vacation homes in Kennebunkport, Maine. I like the photo-op; hanging out with the older guy to look like a younger guy. Nice. It would have worked … if he looked younger. 'Hey this thing with H.W. Bush isn't working. Get me Martin Van Buren and two mopeds.'

Morning Joe Hosts Note McCain Campaign Attempting To Manufacture Controversy Regarding Genocide, Reeks of Desperation (MSNBC 07/24/08)
WILLIE GEIST: Well Barack Obama he's in Israel and said never again as Joe said, not only there but everywhere, it's a reasonable thing to say.

JOE SCARBOROUGH: We're against genocide, you know I don't care what they say, east coast elites, I will not support genocide.

MIKA BRZEZINSKI: It's a bold stand.

SCARBOROUGH: That's a good one. That's a 92 issue.

GEIST: Well the McCain campaign seized on this comment and said you wait just a second Barack Obama and this never again business. Here's what the McCain campaign says quote: "Today he, Barack Obama, says never again. A year ago, stopping genocide wasn't a good enough to keep U.S. forces in Iraq. Doesn't that strike you as inconsistent?" That from the McCain camp. [...]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

SCARBOROUGH: Well the question is if the McCain campaign is going to go down this road, Mike Murphy, don't they also have to also say Bill Clinton was wrong to not invade Rwanda in 1994, Bill Clinton was wrong not to invade Sudan in 1998, George Bush was wrong not to invade the Congo. If this is the McCain campaign's measure, then we would have troops all over the world.

MIKE MURPHY: This is a thread on a complicated sweater. You ought to be careful about polling. Genocide and campaign doesn't mix. I think what the McCain campaign is trying to do is they've had a frustrating week. They're also a campaign that totally believes in day-to-day press tactics. I think sometimes to their, to a mistake. In a view they missed the larger picture. Somebody got up at 3:00am and said what did Barack do? Hit him on that! So we're going to have a genocide discussion here.

McCain Doesn't Get to Play While Obama's Away (ABC 07/24/08 7:15am)
DIANE SAWYER: . . . a new poll out this morning showing Barack Obama leading 47% to 41% over John McCain and it comes as the candidates engage in two very different campaign schedules . . .

[. . .]

SAWYER: . . . Sen. McCain had some big plans this morning but things didn't turn out as he hoped . . .

DAVID WRIGHT: . . . Colombus, Ohio doesn't have quite the flair of a European campaign jaunt. This is more of a meat and potatoes campaign stop. And we are here about eight hours early because the big event of the day got canceled. John McCain had hoped to steal some of Obama's thunder today by climbing aboard an offshore oil rig in Louisiana.

[. . .]

WRIGHT: But Mother Nature intervened. Worse than that, an oil spill closed 29-miles of the Mississippi River. Not exactly the best visual for McCain to make the case that America needs to drill more oil wells. The campaign is painfully aware of Obama's entourage. This week the McCain campaign gave us new press credentials in French and English. They say, the JV Press Squad, the Varsity? They're off with Obama. Today, the closest McCain will come to those adoring crowds in Europe is the reflected glory of a Tour de France champion, Lance Armstrong is endorsing McCain. [this endorsement report was later shown to be incorrect; Mr. Wright corrected it for the West Coast edition]

MATT DOWD: I think anytime in your campaign when you're complaining about media coverage, it means your campaign isn't running well.

WRIGHT: If McCain has any more surprises up his sleeve, he's not tipping his hand.

[cut to interview of McCain]

WRIGHT: Are you going to name your vice president?

JOHN MCCAIN: Uh, we're not talking about it.

[. . .]

WRIGHT: McCain did add one more campaign stop today. Lunch with business leaders here in Colombus.

Highlight #1
Wolf Blitzer Interviews John McCain (CNN 07/25/08 4:16pm)
BLITZER: And joining us now, the Republican presidential candidate, John McCain.

Senator McCain, welcome back.

MCCAIN: Thanks, Wolf. Good to be back.

BLITZER: Let's talk about you're elected president of the United States. It's January 20, 2009. First day you're in the Oval Office. After you're sworn in, what's the first thing you do?

MCCAIN: You sit down with your national security advisers and say, how can we keep the peace in the world, what do we need to do, and what actions do we have to take, what actions have worked, which ones haven't, which policies haven't worked? And keep this nation safe and secure.

And then, of course, how do we restore trust and confidence in government? We've got to take some measures to reform the way that government does business, the way Congress does business, and get Americans' trust and confidence back in this country. And that means -- and their government -- and that means reforming the way the government does business, which Americans have lost trust and confidence in.

BLITZER: And what about what a lot of people call issue #1, the domestic economy, which seems to be in real serious trouble right now and, by almost all accounts, will still be in serious trouble in January of next year? What's the first thing you do on the economy?

MCCAIN: Restrain spending is the first thing we have to do. We have to restrain out-of-control spending.

We have to reform government. We have to embark on measures to keep people in their homes, to keep their taxes low, to create new jobs, and to get our economy back moving again. And that's part of the trust and confidence.

We've got to regain the trust and confidence of the American people, because we have to act together. We have to put our country first.

The Congress and the government is fundamentally gridlocked, as we know. And that's why we see the all-time low approval ratings of Congress. And so we have to sit down together, Republican and Democrat together, and start working for the good of this nation.

Keep people in their homes, provide them with affordable and available health care, create new jobs all across this country. And we can do it.

And one of the major, major aspects of this, of course, is energy independence. The price of a gallon of gas is killing, is harming fixed-income Americans very badly. They are the ones that drive the oldest automobiles and drive the furthest. And so we have to have this positive movement and mission, a national mission, to become independent of foreign oil.

BLITZER: All right. We're going to get to all those issues one by one. Let's talk a little bit about some national security issues.

You're president of the United States. You vowed that you will capture Osama bin Laden and bring him to justice.

Now, we know that President Bush, since 9/11, has been doing the best he can. What would you do differently?

MCCAIN: Well, I'm not going to telegraph a lot of the things that I'm going to do, because then it might compromise our ability to do so. But look, I know the area. I've been there. I know wars, I know how to win wars, and I know how to improve our capabilities so that we will capture Osama bin Laden, or put it this way, bring him to justice.

We can do it. I know how to do it.

BLITZER: If you capture him alive, what do you do with him?

MCCAIN: Of course you put him on trial. I mean, there are ample precedents for that. And it might be a good thing to reveal to the world the enormity of this guy's crimes and his intentions, which are still there, and he's working night and day to destroy everything we stand for and believe in.

BLITZER: Do you do him a regular civilian trial here in the United States, or is it a war crimes tribunal, a military commission? What kind of legal justice would you bring him toward?

MCCAIN: We have various options. But the Nuremberg trials are certainly an example of the kind of tribunal that we could move forward with. I don't think we would have any difficulty devising an international -- an internationally-supported mechanism that would mete out justice. And there's no problem there.

BLITZER: All right. Let's talk about the war in Iraq right now.

Charles Krauthammer, "The Washington Post" conservative columnist, he writes that the prime minister of Iraq, Nuri al-Maliki, in recent days "... voted for Obama, casting the earliest and most ostentatious absentee ballot of this presidential election."

If you were president, and Nuri al-Maliki is still the elected prime minister of Iraq, and he says he wants all U.S. troops out, what do you do?

MCCAIN: Well, first of all, I know Prime Minister Maliki rather well. I know that he is a politician. And I know that they are looking at upcoming elections.

I know that he knows, and the other leaders know there, that it has to be condition-based. Any withdrawals -- which we will withdraw. We have succeeded. The surge has succeeded, and we're on the road to victory.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And we will be out of there. And we may have a residual presence of some kind, as I've always said, but the fact is, the surge has succeeded.

And the fundamental here is that I supported that surge when it was not the popular thing to do. Senator Obama opposed it, said it wouldn't work, even voted to cut off the funds for the men and women who are fighting over there, and still -- and he still doesn't understand to the point where he doesn't agree that the surge has succeeded.

No rational observer who sees the conditions in Iraq today as opposed to two years ago could possibly -- could possibly conclude that the surge hasn't succeeded. So he sees it as a political issue. He doesn't understand the importance of this victory and the consequences of failure and the benefits of success.

If we had done what Senator Obama wanted to do, which by the way, initially would have been the troops out last March, we would have had greater Iranian influence, we would have had an increase in sectarian violence. We would have seen possibly a wider war in the region which would have drawn us back. So I can assure you that Prime Minister Maliki understands that conditions have to be kept. And I want to tell you again, General Petraeus, one of the great generals in history, strongly disagrees with Senator Obama, and our highest ranking military officer also says it would be a very dangerous course.

We're not going to go down that road.

BLITZER: But if Maliki persists, you're president and he says he wants U.S. troops out and he wants them out, let's say, in a year or two years or 16 months or whatever, what do you do? Do you just listen to the prime minister?

MCCAIN: He won't. He won't.

BLITZER: How do you know?

MCCAIN: Because he knows it has to be conditions-based.

BLITZER: How do you know that?

MCCAIN: Because I know him. And I know him very well. And I know the other leaders. And I know -- I've been there eight times, as you know. And I know them very, very well.

And the point is...

BLITZER: So why do you think he said that 16 months is basically a pretty good timetable?

MCCAIN: He said it's a pretty good timetable based on conditions on the ground. I think it's a pretty good timetable, as we should -- our horizons for withdrawal. But they have to be based on conditions on the ground.

This success is very fragile. It's incredibly impressive, but very fragile.

So we know, those of us who have been involved in it for many years, know that if we reverse this by setting a date for withdrawal, all the hard-won victory can be reversed. We're not ready to do that. Too many brave young Americans and their families have sacrificed too much.

But we will be out. And the difference is, we'll be out with victory and honor and not defeat.

Senator Obama has said there's a possibility under his plan we may have to go back. I guarantee you, after they withdraw under what we are doing, we'll never have to go back.

BLITZER: John McCain also makes some controversial comments during our one-on-one interview.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: If you were president, would you move the U.S. Embassy from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem?

MCCAIN: Yes.

BLITZER: When?

MCCAIN: Right away.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Up next, the flash point issue involving U.S. diplomacy in Israel. And he's answering your questions also about what he would do to keep the U.S. safe from attack.

Much more of the interview with Senator McCain coming up.

Plus, Barack Obama canceled plans to visit wounded troops in Germany. Now bloggers are going wild. Obama's campaign is explaining.

We'll have a report. That's coming up as well.

Stay with us. You're in THE SITUATION ROOM.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

BLITZER: Remember our interview with Senator Barack Obama, that's still to come here in THE SITUATION ROOM. A special day here in THE SITUATION ROOM. Both of these presidential candidates speaking to CNN, and a sharp dispute between the nominees-in-waiting over Iraq.

Let's get back to my one-on-one interview with Republican Senator John McCain, which also includes some on-camera questions you've submitted to the senator through our iReports.

Take a look.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: You also made a very serious charge against Senator Obama. You've repeated it, you say you stand by it, that he would rather lose a war to win a political campaign. Raising questions about, you know, his motives.

Joe Klein, writing in "TIME" magazine, says, "This is the ninth presidential campaign I've covered. I can't remember a more scurrilous statement by a major party candidate. It smacks of desperation."

Those are pretty strong words from Joe Klein, whom you obviously know.

But tell us, what are you charging? What are you accusing Obama of doing? MCCAIN: I am accusing -- I am stating the facts. And the facts are, that I don't question Senator Obama's patriotism. I'm sure that he's a very patriotic American. I question his judgment because he lacks experience and knowledge, and I question his judgment.

I'm not prepared to see the sacrifice of so many brave young Americans lost because Senator Obama just views this war as another political issue which he can change positions. And everybody knows that he was able to obtain the nomination of his party by appealing to the far left and committing to a course of action that I believe was -- I know was wrong, because he said the surge would not work. He said had wouldn't succeed.

No rational observer in Iraq today believes that the surge did not succeed. So he just treats it as another political issue because he doesn't understand, and he doesn't have the knowledge and the background to make the kind of judgments that are necessary.

And this war has enormous ramifications. If we had lost it, we would have faced enormous challenges in the region, throughout the world, increased Iranian influence, perhaps even having to come back in a wider war. So he simply does not understand, and treats it as another political issue.

BLITZER: But he says that when it comes to judgment, back in 2002 and 2003, early 2003, before the war, he made the right call in opposing the war to begin with, and he says you blundered, you made the wrong call in supporting going to war against Saddam Hussein.

MCCAIN: I would be more than happy to go through all of that again, and historians will. The fact is that Saddam Hussein was bent on the development of weapons of mass destruction, and I'll be glad to discuss that.

The fact is, what did we do at a critical time when we were about to lose the war? We were losing the war.

Senator Obama wanted to get out, I wanted the surge, which was not popular. The surge works. And now what do we do in the future? Do we continue on the path to victory -- and we've succeeded -- or do we set a time for withdrawal and jeopardize and possibly reverse all the gains that we have made? That's the question on the minds of the American people today.

BLITZER: We invited our viewers, Senator McCain, to submit some video questions for you. Sort of our video version of a town hall meeting.

Jonathan Collins (ph) of Tampa, Florida, says he's very liberal, but he says he has no connections to either campaign. He asks this question -- I'll play it for you. Listen to this.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

JONATHAN COLLINS, FLORIDA: Can you please, in layman's terms, so that the entire world will know when these events happen, we have won the war in Iraq. Can you please give us your definition.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Go ahead, Senator. I guess the question is, define...

MCCAIN: Sure. It's the classic...

BLITZER: Define victory in Iraq.

MCCAIN: Sure. It's the classic outcome of a successful counterinsurgency, which strategy is an effective government, a secure environment, a social, economic and political process that's moving forward. Very importantly, a legal system that is functioning to protect the rights of the people. Americans withdrawing, and the Iraqi people having a chance at freedom and democracy, which obviously they were never going to have under Saddam Hussein.

And we avoid the risk of a wider war. We reduce the influence of Iran in the region. We have a positive impact, even as far away as Afghanistan, because success breeds success.

But an Iraq that is a stable, normal country. And it's not over, as I said.

Al Qaeda is not defeated. They're on their heels, but they're not defeated. That's why we have a ways to go.

But the progress, by any parameter, has been dramatically good. And that's the path to victory in Iraq. And you can see it every single day in Baghdad, Mosul, Basra, and around the country. And I say, thank God.

BLITZER: I have a bunch of short questions. Hopefully some short answers.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

MCCAIN: Sure. Some short answers, OK.

BLITZER: We'll go through it, some straight talk. Some straight talk, as you like to do right now.

If Israel were to decide its existence or its security were threatened and bombed Iran's nuclear facilities, would U.S. presidents stand with Israel?

MCCAIN: I can only tell you, I will not discuss hypotheticals, and I can't.

But I can tell you this. The United States of America is committed to making sure that there's never a second Holocaust. That will be what I will do as president of the United States.

BLITZER: If you were president, would you move the U.S. Embassy from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem?

MCCAIN: Yes.

BLITZER: When?

MCCAIN: Right away.

BLITZER: Like as soon as you're inaugurated, right away, you would order the State Department to do that?

(CROSSTALK)

MCCAIN: I have been -- I have been committed to that proposition for years.

BLITZER: The -- we have this question from Robert Weisman of Skokie, Illinois. He considers him on the liberal side of the spectrum. But he asks this question. Listen to this.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

ROBERT WEISMAN, ILLINOIS: Senator McCain, do you agree with or would you unequivocally reject and repudiate the Bush doctrine of preemptive war?

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Did you hear that question?

MCCAIN: Well, that's -- that's -- yes, that's a very, very tough question. And it's based on the judgment of a commander in chief.

No nation can wait until it is attacked, when it is clear that there is going to be an impending attack from either a terrorist organization or a hostile nation. So, those kinds of judgments need to be made by -- by presidents.

And, again, you have to have the knowledge and the experience and the background to make those kinds of judgments. Do I favor preemptive war? Of course not. None of us do. But it's the first obligation of the president of the United States to secure our nation and make sure that we are not attacked, and American lives are lost or sacrificed.

So, that's why I said when you asked me earlier, what was my first thing I would do as president, and that's to make sure that everything has been done, and is being done, to secure America's safety and security.

BLITZER: All right, we have got a few more quick questions.

MCCAIN: Sure.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

BLITZER: If you were president, would you take steps, would you work to repeal Roe v. Wade?

MCCAIN: I don't agree with the -- I don't agree with the decision. It's a decision that's there. I will appoint judges to the United States Supreme Court that -- that do enforce, strictly, the Constitution of the United States and do not legislate from the bench. BLITZER: Do you support a pathway to citizenship for millions of illegal immigrants in the United States?

MCCAIN: Once we have secured the borders -- and I have not changed my position -- we tried twice in the United States Senate with comprehensive immigration reform, which meant securing our borders, a temporary worker program that works, and a path to citizenship for many, not all, but certainly many of the people who are already here illegally.

Americans want the borders secured first. We can do that. And we can establish a truly temporary worker program through the use of biometric tamper-proof documents. And we can put some people -- or a lot of them -- on the path to citizenship, requiring they pay fines, learn English, do all the things necessary, but the principle that they cannot have any priority of those who either waited or came to this country legally.

BLITZER: Given the high price of gas right now, you recently changed your position on offshore oil drilling. But you still oppose drilling in the Alaska National Wildlife Refuge.

If the price continues to go up, could you see yourself changing your mind on ANWR, as it's called?

MCCAIN: These are -- these are ways to attack a fundamental problem, as we all know, that are hurting Americans.

First, let's get offshore drilling going. Let's do it now. We can do it now. Oil company executives say that it could be as short a time as one to two years. Contrary to the belief of some, just the president's announcement of a lifting of the federal moratorium had an impact on the futures cost of a barrel of oil. Let's get going drilling offshore first, and let's do whatever's necessary, and that includes nuclear power, all -- both of which Senator Obama opposes.

BLITZER: You're in Colorado right now. They have an initiative on their ballot in November that would eliminate affirmative action. I don't know if you're familiar with that referendum, but is that a good idea?

MCCAIN: I'm not familiar with the referendum, Wolf. It's hard for me to say. I have always opposed quotas.

BLITZER: On the vice president front -- this is the final question, Senator -- there are stories out there you want to do this before the Olympic Games start in Beijing on August 8, and not wait any longer. Are those reports true?

MCCAIN: I can't comment on the process that we're going through. And I'm sure you understand that every -- every nominee of the party has gone through this. And I appreciate you asking the question, but I can't comment on the process. Thank you, though. And I know you understand.

(CROSSTALK) BLITZER: Of course we understand. I'm not asking you to tell us who it is.

(LAUGHTER)

BLITZER: I'm just wondering of the timing of when you think we will know.

MCCAIN: Well, I, again, cannot comment on the process. And I apologize for being so obtuse.

BLITZER: Don't -- don't apologize.

(LAUGHTER)

BLITZER: You know, you have every right to be obtuse. You have every right to not answer. This is a free country, as you want.

Senator McCain, appreciate your time.

MCCAIN: But, on this -- but, on this one...

BLITZER: Go ahead.

MCCAIN: Fine.

But, you know, on this one, I'm sure you understand. I'm sure that our viewers understand that, when we start commenting, you really get on a slippery slope. And, sometimes, that's unfair to the people that are under consideration.

And I thank you for having me on, Wolf. This has been a very in- depth interview, and I appreciate the time.

BLITZER: We appreciate your joining us. And we hope you will join us again sooner, rather than later.

MCCAIN: Sure.

BLITZER: Good luck out there on the campaign trail, Senator.

MCCAIN: Thank you.

Global American Supremacy Works with the McCain Agenda, Pfotenhauer Says (FNC 07/25/08 8:23pm)
LAURA INGRAHAM: [Plays clip of Obama in Paris] tell me how John McCain thinks it's proper counter-programming to meet with the Dalai Lama when Obama is meeting with the president of France?

NANCY PFOTENHAUER: Well Senator McCain has a lot of respect for the Dalai Lama., as do most leaders of the free world, if you will and right now there's the opportunity because he is in the United States. Senator McCain was already traveling to Colorado, which is a very important state for us in the upcoming election. So it's the opportunity to sit down with him and get his read on whether or not China is making good really on their promise to try to bring together progress after the very serious uprising and heavy- handed approach of China in April.

INGRAHAM: So is this McCain counter-programming with his own foreign policy and diplomatic expertise and meeting with this clear foe of the Chinese repression what's going on in China, Tibet because I'm heartened to hear that because we've had administration after administration cozy up to China. Does this foreshadow some new viewpoint on the part of McCain?

PFOTENHAUER: Well, Senator McCain has always been very, very clear on this type of—whenever this type of situation arises in the world and when this situation occurred in April, Senator McCain issued a very strong statement, saying China needed to change the way they were treating the Dalai Lama and the Tibetans and, in fact, if they didn't see that kind of progress that President Bush should consider not attending the opening ceremonies in China so this is kind of a follow-up visit.

But, if I may, what Senator McCain has been doing this week when Barack Obama has been being a citizen of the world, if you will, he's been reaching out to American citizens and he's been talking about the issues that they care about, bringing energy prices down, getting the economy on track, and keeping our nation safe and that is reflected in the tightening poll numbers in these key battleground states that we're seeing in Minnesota, in Michigan, and in Colorado.

INGRAHAM: He's still behind in almost every major in pretty much every major national poll, however, Nancy and we had Larry Sabato on the show from University of Virginia and his point is that McCain's running a campaign that's too risk-averse. He's not taking risks out on the campaign trail. What do you think of that criticism? And I think he's pointing to the when you're going to select the and announce the vice-presidential choice and I would say, go out there. Go to ANWR and say, 'Look, I've examined the situation, and it is important to decrease the price of gasoline for every American than it is for me to stand on my horse […] in ANWR.

PFOTENHAUER: Well, you know I heard Larry, what Larry had to say and I have to say I disagree with him. First of all, if you look at the generic ballots, Senator McCain is doing fantastically well and that is a reflection of a lot of things. Mostly that what his message is resonating [sic] and the more people focus, in the next hundred days, on the choice they have before them, with Senator McCain and his different view of the role of government, if you will, and Senator Obama, who has a view that is much closer to Germany and France […] with their high taxes, high spending, high regulation approach to economic policy that's a job killer and it's the worst thing you can do in this economy, versus Senator McCain, who is talking about low taxes, low spending, free trade, increasing domestic production and to lower energy prices. That's what people are going to want.

INGRAHAM: Let me tell you what my listeners on my radio show are saying and this is a pretty generic comment, but […] I am making a generalization here. They're frustrated because they think Senator McCain is not hitting Obama hard enough. I know he turned up the heat on the rhetoric this week and a lot of us were glad to see that.

I talked to the Talking Points Memo about talking to the American constituency versus the European constituency. The American worker versus the world worker or the European worker. That message is going to be […] what hits people harder than this blathering about this or that issue on a daily basis. I think it's got to be an America-first, America's supremacy in the world, we will not give that up. That 's my view and that's' what my listeners are saying.

PFOTENHAUER: Well I don't think that's, at all, at odds with what we've been saying. In fact, Senator McCain has called Senator Obama on the carpet on a few things […] the idea that Senator Obama can go to Iraq and openly disregard the recommendations of our generals on the ground there is stunning. It's absolutely stunning. Then you see him standing next to President Sarkozy, […] articulating a position that is at odds with a position he articulated two weeks ago.

I don't know whether he forgot it or whether he's just so used to pandering to whatever audience he's talking to that that's just what comes out of his mouth, but Senator McCain has been calling him on that and focusing correctly […] on what his vision for the country is. That is what people are responding to.

McCain Visits with Dalai Lama in Aspen, Colorado (CNN Live Stream)
MCCAIN: […] I urge the Chinese leaders to engage in talks and make progress with his holiness representatives in addressing the just grievances of the Tibetan people. […] The Olympics next month should be a time for China to demonstrate to the world that it's committed to respecting the basic human rights of its people. The United States welcomes good relations with China, but it does no service to the Chinese government, and certainly no service to the people of China, for the United States and other democracies to pretend that suppression of rights in China does not concern us. It does, will and must concern us. […]

DALAI LAMA: […] My basic commitment is promotion of human value. […] My old friend, now one of the candidates of the president this great sort of country. […] In deed I feel great great honor, and he showing genuine concern about democracy, human rights, and environmental issues in china […]

MCCAIN: Thank you your Holiness, and that is not an endorsement, that is a statement of the incredible power and influence of this unique citizen of the world in the cause of human rights and freedom. And of course our prayers are with you and the people of Tibet, particularly those, those that are held as political prisoners today. We urge the Chinese government to free them as soon as possible. […]

Olbermann: McCain Calls Obama a Failure then Steals his Iraq Timeline for his Own (MSNBC 07/25/08 08:05pm)
OLBERMANN: Senator McCain has tonight reached a new high and low. First announcing that Barack Obama has failed the so called commander and chief test, then on TV endorsing Obama's plan for bringing forces home from Iraq. Senator McCain now saying a 16-month withdrawal timetable based on conditions on the ground is a pretty good timetable. The presumptive Republican nominee had already smeared his opponent for not having supported the surge. Never mind that the Arizona Republican cannot define that surge or pinpoint when it started. Senator McCain claiming that because he supported the surge and Senator Obama did not, the democrat failed what, thank you Senator Clinton, "Amounted to a real time test for future commander and chief. By the time he sat down for an interview with CNN, Senator McCain had embraced the failure's strategy for bringing the troops home. Hypothetically, McCain was asked what would he do as President should Iraq Prime Minister Maliki persist in saying, as he said as late as Monday, that he wants US Forces gone.

[Clip of CNN Interview]

MCCAIN: He won't because he knows it has to be conditions based.

WOLF BLITZER: How do you know?

MCCAIN: Because I know him and I know him very well. And I know the other leaders, and I know, I've been there 8 times as you know. And I know them very very well.

BLITZER: So why do you think he said that 16 months is basically a pretty good timetable.

MCCAIN: He said it's a pretty good timetable based on conditions on the ground. I think it's a pretty good timetable, as we should have horizons for withdrawal. But they have to be based on conditions on the ground.

OLBERMANN: To recap, Senator Obama has failed the commander in Chief test so Senator McCain steals the 16-month timetable for withdrawal, depending on conditions on the ground, from the failure, and then claims it as his own good idea.

Chris Matthews: McCain's Desire for Permanent Bases in Iraq is Preventing him from Using Maliki's Statement's to Declare Victory and Withdraw (MSNBC 07/25/08 05:10pm)
CHRIS MATTHEWS: Well here is Senator McCain in Denver today on the home front. This is home fries vs. French fries.

JOHN MCCAIN: I went to Iraq many times and heard all the phony explanations about how we were winning. I knew we were failing and I told that to an administration that didn't want to hear it. I pushed for the new strategy that has now succeeded before most people even admitted there was a problem. Fortunately Senator Obama failed, not our military. We rejected the audacity of hopelessness, and we were right. Violence in Iraq fell to such low levels for such a long time that Senator Obama, detecting the success he never believed possible, falsely claimed that he'd always predicted it.

MATTHEWS: You know Ron and Chuck, the reaction from the Barack Obama campaign […] was he's angry. Are you gonna treat him like Mr. Wilson yelling at the kid on his lawn?

RON BROWNSTEIN: John McCain talked about bringing Barack Obama to educate him this spring. I mean look McCain I think does have a certain level of lack of respect for Obama […]. If you're looking forward the success of the surge seems to be driving the politics both in Iraq and in the US towards removing our troops. He wants to look back and say this was a test of judgment. Of course what Barack Obama can say is there was a bigger test a more fundamental test whether to launch the war in the first place. I was right on that and you were wrong. But that's the backward looking frame McCain wants to put on it.

MATTHEWS: […] Why doesn't John McCain brag now and say I was right, we won the war to the point were Maliki feels safe enough to say we can leave. I have accomplished our goal. Give enough security to those politicians in Iraq that they can let us go. He won, why doesn't he declare victory? Unless he wants permanent bases in Iraq. He's in with the Neo-Conservatives and wants permanent bases and doesn't agree with Maliki.

CHUCK TODD: […] He also said he would have most of the troops out by the end of his first term. that's a shift and you haven't heard rhetoric like that from McCain before. […]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

MATTHEWS: I think the debate is going to come down to whether we have permanent bases in Iraq or not. Because Maliki obviously doesn't want us to have them there.

BROWNSTEIN: and McCain has talked about a commitment to Iraq that could extend for decades.

MATTHEWS: Whether they like it or not!

TODD: But notice he hasn't talked about that lately.

Here's Obama in 2007:

Barack Obama, 2007

Thank you so much. To the great Governor of Iowa and Lieutenant. Governor of Iowa. To my dear friend Tom Harkin for the outstanding work that he does. To the congressional delegation of Iowa that is doing outstanding work and to Nancy Pelosi , Madam Speaker, thank you all for the wonderful welcome and the wonderful hospitality.

[Responding to audience] I love you back.

A little less than one year from today, you will go into the voting booth and you will select the President of the United States of America. Now, here's the good news -- the name George W. Bush will not be on the ballot. The name of my cousin Dick Cheney will not be on the ballot. We've been trying to hide that for a long time. Everybody has a black sheep in the family. The era of Scooter Libby justice, and Brownie incompetence, and Karl Rove politics will finally be over.

But the question you're going to have to ask yourself when you caucus in January and you vote in November is, "What's next for America?" We are in a defining moment in our history. Our nation is at war. The planet is in peril. The dream that so many generations fought for feels as if it's slowly slipping away. We are working harder for less. We've never paid more for health care or for college. It's harder to save and it's harder to retire. And most of all we've lost faith that our leaders can or will do anything about it.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

We were promised compassionate conservatism and all we got was Katrina and wiretaps. We were promised a uniter, and we got a President who could not even lead the half of the country that voted for him. We were promised a more ethical and more efficient government, and instead we have a town called Washington that is more corrupt and more wasteful than it was before. And the only mission that was ever accomplished is to use fear and falsehood to take this country to a war that should have never been authorized and should have never been waged.

It is because of these failures that America is listening, intently, to what we say here today -- not just Democrats, but Republicans and Independents who've lost trust in their government, but want to believe again.

And it is because of these failures that we not only have a moment of great challenge, but also a moment of great opportunity. We have a chance to bring the country together in a new majority -- to finally tackle problems that George Bush made far worse, but that had festered long before George Bush ever took office -- problems that we've talked about year after year after year after year.

And that is why the same old Washington textbook campaigns just won't do in this election. That's why not answering questions, because we are afraid our answers won't be popular just won't do. That's why telling the American people what we think they want to hear instead of telling the American people what they need to hear just won't do. Triangulating and poll-driven positions because we're worried about what Mitt or Rudy might say about us just won't do. If we are really serious about wining this election Democrats, we can't live in fear of losing it.
This party -- the party of Jefferson and Jackson; of Roosevelt and Kennedy -- has always made the biggest difference in the lives of the American people when we led, not by polls, but by principle; not by calculation, but by conviction; when we summoned the entire nation to a common purpose -- a higher purpose. And I run for the Presidency of the United States of America because that's the party America needs us to be right now.

A party that offers not just a difference in policies, but a difference in leadership.

A party that doesn't just focus on how to win but why we should. A party that doesn't just offer change as a slogan, but real, meaningful change -- change that America can believe in. That's why I'm in this race. That's why I am running for the Presidency of the United States of America -- to offer change that we can believe in.

I am in this race to tell the corporate lobbyists that their days of setting the agenda in Washington are over. I have done more than any other candidate in this race to take on lobbyists -- and won. They have not funded my campaign, they will not get a job in my White House, and they will not drown out the voices of the American people when I am President. I'm in this race to take those tax breaks away from companies that are moving jobs overseas and put them in the pockets of hard working Americans who deserve it. And I won't raise the minimum wage every ten years -- I will raise it to keep pace so that workers don't' fall behind.

That is why I am in it. To protect the American worker. To fight for the American worker.
I'm in this race because I want to stop talking about the outrage of 47 million Americans without health care and start actually doing something about it. I expanded health care in Illinois by bringing Democrats and Republicans together. By taking on the insurance industry. And that is how I will make certain that every single American in this country has health care they can count on and I won't do it twenty years from now, I won't do it ten years from now, I will do it by the end of my first term as President of the United States of America.

I run for president to make sure that every American child has the best education that we have to offer -- from the day they are born to the day they graduate from college. And I won't just talk about how great teachers are -- as President I will reward them for their greatness -- by raising salaries and giving them more support. That's why I'm in this race.

I am running for President because I am sick and tired of democrats thinking that the only way to look tough on national security is by talking, and acting, and voting like George Bush Republicans.

When I am this party's nominee, my opponent will not be able to say that I voted for the war in Iraq; or that I gave George Bush the benefit of the doubt on Iran; or that I supported Bush-Cheney policies of not talking to leaders that we don't like. And he will not be able to say that I wavered on something as fundamental as whether or not it is ok for America to torture -- because it is never ok. That's why I am in it.

As President, I will end the war in Iraq. We will have our troops home in sixteen months. I will close Guantanamo. I will restore habeas corpus. I will finish the fight against Al Qaeda. And I will lead the world to combat the common threats of the 21st century -- nuclear weapons and terrorism; climate change and poverty; genocide and disease. And I will send once more a message to those yearning faces beyond our shores that says, "You matter to us. Your future is our future. And our moment is now."

America, our moment is now.

Our moment is now.

I don't want to spend the next year or the next four years re-fighting the same fights that we had in the 1990s.

I don't want to pit Red America against Blue America, I want to be the President of the United States of America.

And if those Republicans come at me with the same fear-mongering and swift-boating that they usually do, then I will take them head on. Because I believe the American people are tired of fear and tired of distractions and tired of diversions. We can make this election not about fear, but about the future. And that won't just be a Democratic victory; that will be an American victory.

And that is a victory America needs right now.

I am not in this race to fulfill some long-held ambitions or because I believe it's somehow owed to me. I never expected to be here, I always knew this journey was improbable. I've never been on a journey that wasn't.

I am running in this race because of what Dr. King called "the fierce urgency of now." Because I believe that there's such a thing as being too late. And that hour is almost upon us.

I don't want to wake up four years from now and find out that millions of Americans still lack health care because we couldn't take on the insurance industry.

I don't want to see that the oceans have risen a few more inches. The planet has reached a point of no return because we couldn't find a way to stop buying oil from dictators.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I don't want to see more American lives put at risk because no one had the judgment or the courage to stand up against a misguided war before we sent our troops into fight.

I don't want to see homeless veterans on the streets. I don't want to send another generation of American children to failing schools. I don't want that future for my daughters. I don't want that future for your sons. I do not want that future for America.

I'm in this race for the same reason that I fought for jobs for the jobless and hope for the hopeless on the streets of Chicago; for the same reason I fought for justice and equality as a civil rights lawyer; for the same reason that I fought for Illinois families for over a decade.

Because I will never forget that the only reason that I'm standing here today is because somebody, somewhere stood up for me when it was risky. Stood up when it was hard. Stood up when it wasn't popular. And because that somebody stood up, a few more stood up. And then a few thousand stood up. And then a few million stood up. And standing up, with courage and clear purpose, they somehow managed to change the world.

That's why I'm running, Iowa -- to give our children and grandchildren the same chances somebody gave me.

That's why I'm running, Democrats -- to keep the American Dream alive for those who still hunger for opportunity, who still thirst for equality.

That's why I'm asking you to stand with me, that's why I'm asking you to caucus for me, that's why I am asking you to stop settling for what the cynics say we have to accept. In this election -- in this moment -- let us reach for what we know is possible. A nation healed. A world repaired. An America that believes again. Thank you very much everybody.

John -

As President Obama addressed the graduating class of 2014 at the U.S. Military Academy at West Point, he said "We must broaden our tools to include diplomacy and development."

His words are something to consider as diplomats gather in Vienna, Austria to hammer out a long-term agreement to ensure Iran never has the ability to develop a nuclear weapon.

They have until July 20th to work out a deal, or extend the process, but several Senators are already furiously working to derail the effort.

They need to hear from us today:

Join tens of thousands of veterans and military family members and sign our petition calling on the U.S. Senate to allow the diplomatic process to work with Iran.

Sadly, it's many of the same discredited neoconservative voices pushing for harsher sanctions that will trigger a new arms race in the region.

Colonel Lawrence Wilkerson, former Chief of Staff to United States Secretary of State Colin Powell, said "To a soldier, the phrase 'seeking a diplomatic solution' is sweet music."

And if the diplomatic talks between Washington and Tehran fall apart, we'll have the opportunity to talk about which sanctions to reinstate or intensity.

But for now, we should all hope that those efforts succeed.

Tell Congress: Give Diplomacy with Iran a Chance.

http://action.votevets.org/iran-diplomacy

The question is ... how badly do we want to avoid more war?

Thanks for standing with VoteVets on this issue.

All,

As you are all aware, Jo Becker from the NYT's investigative unit is one of several reporters at work on stories based on material provided by the publisher of the upcoming Clinton Cash book. Jo's story is scheduled to run in as soon as one week.

Separately, this afternoon, Amy Chozick from the NYT called us to indicate she had obtained a copy of the book on her own and intends to file a separate story tomorrow. Her story will not unpack all of the book's claims -- she will leave that to Jo. Instead, she will do a more process-y story about the book's existence, the fact that the publisher has approached multiple media outlets in advance of the book's publication to spoon-feed them some of the book's research, and also remark on the fact that Rand Paul continues to drop hints about the book's contents such that it appears they may be some coordination with individual Republican campaigns.

We think this story, though it was not originated by us, could end up being somewhat helpful in casting the book's author as having a conservative agenda. Moreover, we think Amy is suspicious of the arrangements that the book's publisher has reached with the various media outlets (including her own paper). In fact, Jo Becker is apparently trying to get this story killed because she thinks it will undermine her investigative piece later this month. But so far it is running in tomorrow's paper.

Amy is seeking a response from us on what our approach is to the looming publication of the book and the apparently well coordinated rollout. We have drafted the below response, and wanted you all to see it and provide feedback before we sent it off. Please note, however, that in order to get the statement into the story, we probably need to provide it by about 8:30 tonight. So apologies for the tight turnaround, but here it is:

> "We always expected that while Hillary Clinton was focused on how to help everyday Americans get ahead, the Republicans would focus their efforts on attacks rather than ideas. It appears that this book is being used to aid this coordinated attack strategy, twisting previously known facts into absurd conspiracy theories. It will not be the first work of partisan-fueled fiction about the Clintons' record, and we know it will not be the last."

Thank you,
Brian

Subject:	RE: Three Years of Strife and Cruelty Put Syria in Tailspin - NYTimes.com

Dear Herb,

You're absolutely right. The one silver lining I see is that we finally managed a UN Security Council resolution on Feb 22, ordering the release of prisoners, an end to the barrel bombing and other indiscriminate warfare, the lifting of sieges, and the opening of borders to humanitarian aid. The only reason we got that is because we convinced governments to push it forward during the Sochi Olympics when Russia would be reluctant to veto as it has in the past (despite initial US objection, because Kerry was focused on Geneva II, meaning that Russia was a "partner in peace," not an accomplice in mass murder). The task now is to enforce the resolution, with Russia obviously in a much less cooperative mood. However, the sanctions that the US and EU are moving toward on Ukraine are what we've been pushing for some time to force Russia to rein in Assad. Very unclear how this will all play out, but Ukraine changes things for Syria, probably making things more difficult, but also potentially making Russia more vulnerable to pressure.

I'm seeing Angela Merkel in an hour. This is one of the big topics.

Warm regards,

Ken

Reports says Podesta told the person on the other end there were two things he was most concerned about. The first was being outgunned in money by Jeb Bush; second that he was worried about the psychosis of the media which we created. Reporter says when contacted for a response, the campaign said while Podesta admits thinking the press at times can be a bit psychotic, they are calling the rest of the report inaccurate. Panelist says this belief does not in any way shape or form absolve HRC from talking to the media. Reporter says HRC doesn't respond to questions from the media and plays the victim so it speaks more to "the psychosis of the Clintons." Panelist says the press is psychotic because HRC tied them up. Says the press has always loved Bill but not HRC. Says she drives around in Scooby Doo van and drags them on a wild chase and then doesn't talk to them. Kennedy says HRC is a strange lawyer who is riding her famous husband's coattails. Reporter says that by not granting interviews, HRC is making the media want her even more. Draws on the example of Brianna Keeler and says when Keeler asked HRC about her ideas for the economy, HRC said she would have to watch the speech on Monday. Panelist says even when she grants an availability, she isn't really available. Outnumbered . 2015 07 15,Hillary Clinton,Commentary,National,Report of John Podesta overhearing.mp4

-- Commentary on HRC endorsing the Iran deal. Panelist says that you can see from HRC's statement that she is cautious about endorsing it because she knows it's not the greatest of deals. Host says HRC has to distance herself even though Obama seems to think it is going to be good for his legacy. Claims that President Obama doesn't understand that Iran doesn't believe in doing deals with infidels and Iran won't honor the deal. Says the best thing for his legacy would have been to walk away from the deal. Says the best thing that people can do now is lobby their democratic senators to vote against the deal in order to get a veto-proof vote. Highlights that Jewish constituencies will be powerful in influencing their senators. Outnumbered . 2015 07 15,Hillary Clinton,Commentary,National,Commentary on HRC's Iran deal statement.mp4

--Report that HRC expressed support for the Iran deal and is parroting the economic policies of this administration. Chuck Rocha joins the show and says that HRC's rhetoric is smart politics on her part and says the country has greatly improved in economic standing under Obama. Eliana Johnson says HRC's economic speech was more political than policy. Says that HRC indicated that we wouldn't get anything new and exciting from her, but rather more of the same. Says if you want new and exciting, look to Bernie Sanders. Host says people want to know what will work. Johnson says HRC elbowed the Obama administration by saying we have to go after Wall Street. Rocha says there is frustration from the American workers who have not felt the recovery and HRC should talk more about how that money can create more American jobs so that Americans feel like they have a voice in government. -- Analysis of HRC's support for the Iran deal. Lawrence O'Donnell says HRC is supporting the deal because it's the right thing both politically and in terms of politics. Says this is a very unique agreement because it is so much within the next president's power to decide what happens with the deal. Gene Robinson joins the show and says if the deal is functioning, it will be difficult for the next president to get rid of the deal. Says getting rid of the deal would be essentially a declaration of war. Lawrence O'Donnell says that, from a political perspective, people are in favor of a deal with Iran and the last candidate to say he wanted a strike on Iran was Mitt Romney. -- Mia Love comments on meeting with HRC on Capitol Hill with the Black Caucus. Says it was very interesting and HRC expressed support for the Iran deal even though details had not come out yet. Love says she asked HRC how she trusts a nation that does not like Americans and HRC responded by saying that we have to be involved or Iran will build a nuclear weapon anyway. Love says she just doesn't see the argument for giving Iran money to bring them a step closer to building those. Robert Hurt Puts Uranium Business Ties over Community Interest

Charlottesville, VA - Today the League of Conservation Voters and the Sierra Club jointly released a new television ad highlighting Virginia's 5th District GOP candidate Robert Hurt and his father's ties to the uranium industry. While serving as a Virginia state senator, Hurt voted in favor of industry interests and against public health, allowing uranium mining projects to move forward, despite evidence that uranium mining can lead to radioactive contamination of air and ground water, causing cancer and birth defects. The six-figure buy will have the ad running on broadcast and cable in the district through the end of the election.

"With his father's connections to the uranium industry, and a moratorium on the mining already in place, Robert Hurt has tough questions to answer about his position on risky uranium mining in Virginia," said Cathy Duvall, Sierra Club's Political Director. "We are working to get the word out that we can't let extremists like Robert Hurt vote for their own business interests over the interests of Virginians."

Hurt is a Tea Party-supported candidate who opposes legislation to create more jobs, less pollution and greater security by refusing to hold corporate polluters accountable for their share of climate change pollution.

"Voters in Virginia's fifth district have a choice this election: they can vote for Robert Hurt who would side with corporate polluters over Virginia families, or they can re-elect Tom Perriello who has proven his commitment to bringing new clean energy jobs to Virginia and making America less dependent on foreign oil," said Tony Massaro, LCV's Senior Vice President for Political Affairs. "Hurt's support for the failed dirty energy policies of the past makes him the wrong choice for Virginia."

Both LCV Action Fund and the Sierra Club have endorsed Tom Perriello for his strong leadership on clean energy legislation.

SUMMARY OF TODAY'S NEWS

Rep. Paul Ryan said Sunday the House has the votes to approve President Barack Obama's free trade initiative. Labor leaders are supportive of her current strategy of staying neutral saying, "Right now, personally, there's no reason she should take a position on it, she's not a government official."

The Washington Post outlines Hillary Clinton's strategy as "a bet that social and demographic shifts mean that no left-leaning position Clinton takes now is likely to hurt her when she makes her case to moderate and independent voters in the general election next year."

Hillary Clinton will make her second campaign trip to Iowa today and Tuesday, May 19. During her visit, she will discuss ideas to expand small businesses in Iowa - an issue Clinton heard about during her previous trip through the state.

TODAY'S KEY STORIES

Running to the left, Hillary Clinton is banking on the Obama coalition to win // WaPo // Anne Gearan - May 17, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton is running as the most liberal Democratic presidential front-runner in decades, with positions on issues from gay marriage to immigration that would, in past elections, have put her at her party's precarious left edge.

The moves are part of a strategic conclusion by Clinton's emerging campaign: that it can harness the same kind of young and diverse coalition as Barack Obama did in 2008 and 2012, bolstered by even stronger appeal among women.

Her approach — outlined in interviews with aides and advisers — is a bet that social and demographic shifts mean that no left-leaning position Clinton takes now is likely to hurt her when she makes her case to moderate and independent voters in the general election next year.

The strategy relies on calculations about the 2016 landscape, including that up to 31 percent of the electorate will be Americans of color — a projection that may be overly optimistic for her campaign. It factors in that a majority of independent voters already support same-sex marriage and the pathway to citizenship for undocumented immigrants that Clinton endorsed this month.

The game plan also hinges on a conclusion by Clinton strategists that the broad appeal of issues such as paid family leave, a higher minimum wage and more affordable college will help outweigh any concerns about costs.

The campaign's overall calculus relies on a mix of polling — including both internal and public surveys — internal focus groups and what advisers described as gut feelings about the national mood. It also reflects what Clinton backers say are her firmly held personal convictions and her pragmatism.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Her approach to this really is not trying to take a ruler out and measure where she wants to be on some ideological scale,” Clinton campaign chairman John Podesta said. “It’s to dive deeply into the problems facing the American people and American families. She’s a proud wonk, and she looks at policy from that perspective.”

Clinton’s full embrace of same-sex marriage in the first days of her campaign was followed by clear statements in favor of scrapping get-tough immigration and incarceration policies — many of which took root during her husband’s administration. She has also weighed in with liberal takes on climate change, abortion rights and disparities in income and opportunity between rich and poor.

All are issues that have been divisive in the past for both Democrats and Republicans. But none are now judged to be radioactive for Democrats, which gives Clinton more elbow room.

By taking such positions, aides and advisers hope Clinton will not only inoculate herself against a serious challenge from the left in the primaries, but that she also will be able to push on through the general election. Her campaign believes American public opinion has moved left not only since Bill Clinton won election in 1992 on a centrist platform, but also since Barack Obama won on a more liberal one.

Republicans — as part of a broader critique of her trustworthiness — accuse Clinton of flip-flopping on some positions and hiding on others, such as free trade, to cater to the liberal base.

“Clinton’s already moved her position leftward on numerous hot button issues to the base, including immigration, gay marriage, Wall Street and criminal justice reforms,” conservative America Rising PAC director Colin Reed wrote in a position paper Friday.

“Clinton’s moves reinforce all her worst attributes as a candidate and hurt her image among voters of all stripes,” Reed said. “Progressive voters know that she’s not truly one of them” while swing voters “see a desperate politician staking out far-left positions that are outside of the mainstream of most Americans.”

Many political strategists also say Clinton will be hard-pressed to re-create Obama’s winning coalition and that the 30 percent to 31 percent non-white turnout that some of her outside backers are projecting may be out of reach. Exit polls show non-white turnout was 28 percent in 2012 and 26 percent in 2008. Clinton will have to expand Hispanic support, increase turnout among independent women and still hold onto a large share of black voters drawn to the first African American major party nominee.

The bold stance on immigration is widely seen as one way to jump-start the expansion of Hispanic support Clinton will need, although advisers say she had already made up her mind about citizenship and there was no reason to put off an announcement. When outlining her position in Nevada, where 1 in 4 residents is Hispanic, she made a point of saying that no Republican would go as far — and alleged the GOP wanted immigrants to have “second-class status.”

“People often talk about the electorate moving left,” said Clinton senior policy adviser Jake Sullivan. “I think it’s more that the electorate is just getting more practical. For Hillary Clinton, that matches her evidence-based approach. The arguments that persuade her are evidence-based and progressive.”

He cited the growing consensus that mass incarceration is expensive and unworkable, and that the country is never going to deport all of the more than 11 million people who are here illegally.

Advisers do not dispute that Clinton has a finger to the wind of the national mood, but they insist the timing and substance of her positions are not driven by polling. The still-cautious candidate has declined to make clear her position on two key proposals that many liberals oppose: the Keystone XL Pipeline and Obama's free-trade deal.

Sullivan also noted that some of Clinton's early proposals "cut against the grain" of political liberalism, such as her emphasis on improving the playing field for American small businesses.

Clinton will debut policy proposals to ease lending bottlenecks for small businesses on campaign trips to Iowa and New Hampshire this week. The impetus came largely from conversations Clinton had in the run-up to the campaign and a six-month policy review led by Sullivan that looked at how Clinton might address a range of national concerns.

"The thing she is most interested in is not what position is most popular, it's what do people worry about," Sullivan said.

Clinton's 2008 campaign was so focused on polling data and the consequences of saying the wrong thing that it sometimes appeared paralyzed. Some of that campaign's infamous staff battles focused on the advice from senior adviser Mark Penn, a pollster, to avoid more liberal positions in the primary that year for fear they would hurt her in a general election contest.

This time is different, backers say. "The strategic advantage the Democrats have is that the distance between our base and the middle is shorter than for Republicans," said Neera Tanden, president of the liberal Center for American Progress and a longtime Clinton confidant.

In other words, Clinton's strategists say, she does not face the same whiplash as Republican candidates who seek to dial back hard-right positions on issues such as abortion or immigration adopted during a competitive primary.

Senior campaign officials acknowledged that trade is a divisive and fraught issue for Democrats and for her. Clinton's past support for the Asia free trade pact makes her current silence awkward at best, but her advisers are gambling that the issue won't leave an enduring rift within the party.

Clinton campaign leaders and outside loyalists also bridle at the perception that she is less of a progressive politician than, say, Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.). They point to Clinton's early career as a crusading lawyer in Arkansas and lifelong professional commitments to improving women's lives.

Warren has said she isn't running but has declined so far to endorse Clinton. Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) is running a strongly populist challenge to Clinton, and former Maryland governor Martin O'Malley — who has suggested Clinton is too hesitant and poll-driven — is expected to enter the race this month.

"If Clinton and other candidates are not seen as standing with Warren on the TPP trade deal and a number of other economic issues critical to working families, it could create an even greater sense of urgency" to get Warren into the race, said Gary Ritterstein, an adviser to the support group Ready for Warren.

The clearest shift in national attitudes, and Clinton's own, has come on same-sex marriage. She moved from saying she considered marriage to be between a man and a woman when she was first lady to backing civil unions as an alternative to marriage in 2008 to full support of gay and lesbian marriage now.

Public opinion polling suggests she is on safe ground, despite ongoing legal fights in several states. The firmest opposition to gay marriage is centered in red states and among Republican voters unlikely to consider voting for Clinton.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Pew Research polling shows that in August 2008 — when Clinton endorsed Obama as the Democratic nominee — 52 percent of Americans opposed legal same-sex marriage and 39 percent supported it. The same poll now shows 54 percent support for such marriages while 39 percent are opposed.

Shifts on criminal justice issues are less dramatic, but there are bipartisan efforts now to repeal some of the harshest and least flexible laws on the books for two decades. Outrage and revulsion over police killings of black men over the past year made the issue more urgent for many young, African American and socially liberal voters.

Last month, Clinton gave an address calling for dramatic changes in policing and prosecution to lessen the rate of incarceration. The remarks echo similar calls among both Democrats and some Republicans, such as Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.).

“Two or three years ago,” said Clinton policy adviser Ann O’Leary, “that speech might have been seen as a very left-leaning speech.”

Groups lobbying on trade paid Hillary Clinton $2.5M in speaking fees // CBS News // Julianna Goldman – May 18, 2015

Since leaving her post as secretary of state, Hillary Clinton earned millions of dollars delivering 41 paid speeches in the U.S. to a variety of companies and organizations. At least 10 of those groups have been lobbying Congress and federal agencies on trade, an issue that has divided Democrats as the Obama administration pushes for a 12-nation pacific trade deal - and around which Hillary Clinton has remained mum.

Clinton has spoken in general terms on trade, saying in New Hampshire last month that any trade deal "has to produce jobs and raise wages and increase prosperity and protect our security." But the issue pits liberal Democrats against the White House and Republicans, and there's a chorus of Democrats are calling for Clinton to weigh in.

Critics say Clinton Foundation has pattern of not disclosing foreign donors

In the weeks since she launched her presidential bid, Clinton has been dogged by questions about whether special interests sought to buy influence while she was secretary of state through donations to the Clinton Foundation and through Bill Clinton's paid speeches. For the first time, Hillary Clinton's financial disclosures provide a picture of the speaking engagements for which she was paid since leaving the State Department and at a time when she was actively considering whether to run for president.

According to the disclosures released by the campaign on Friday evening, the former secretary of state earned at least $2.7 million from speeches at companies backing the trade promotion authority (TPA) that President Obama has been seeking in order to "fast track" approval of trade deals. While that's a fraction of the $25 million Bill and Hillary Clinton earned from paid speeches from January 2014 to present, they nonetheless open the presidential candidate to criticism.

"She's put herself in the position where people are going to question whether she was influenced by the money she was paid if she supports the trade agreements," said Larry Noble, senior counsel at the Campaign Legal Center. "One of the problems with these situations is even if she reaches her decision for reasons she truly believes in, people are going to question it. It undermines her credibility."

· The Democrats' internal battle over free trade

A number of Clinton's appearances before the organizations lobbying on trade were among her most lucrative speeches.

Clinton earned $335,000 from Qualcomm for a speech in San Diego on October 14, 2014; $335,000 from the Biotechnology Industry Organization on June 25, 2014; and $325,000 from Cisco Systems for a speech in Las Vegas on August 28, 2014. According to data compiled by the Center for Responsive Politics, both tech companies lobbied in support of TPA in 2014 and 2015. They're also members of the Trade Benefits America Coalition, which in November 2014 sent a letter to congressional leaders saying, "As members of the Trade Benefits America Coalition, we write to urge passage of bipartisan Trade Promotion Authority (TPA) legislation this year....Congressional action on TPA is needed to help ensure high-standard outcomes in the Trans-Pacific Partnership (TPP) negotiations, which the United States and 11 other Asia-Pacific countries are striving to complete."

That letter was also signed by General Electric and Xerox, companies that paid Hillary Clinton to give speeches in 2014. Clinton earned $225,000 from GE on January 6, 2014 and $225,000 from Xerox Corporation on March 18, 2014. In total, she earned at least $1.4 million from companies signing that letter.

To be sure, these companies have lobbied on a variety of issues. Qualcomm, for example, lobbied on more than 15 policy areas including transportation and taxes in 2015.

Likewise, trade has traditionally been a thorny issue for Democratic presidential candidates who are courting progressives and union support. In 2008, Clinton and then-Sen. Obama sparred over NAFTA, the trade deal with the U.S., Canada and Mexico, struck Bill Clinton signed during his presidency.

As secretary of state, Clinton publicly promoted the Trans Pacific Partnership (TPP). In her book, "Hard Choices," she said it would level the playing field for American workers in a global marketplace, and that it would "link markets throughout Asia."

Now, the Clinton campaign says she'll be watching negotiations closely.

Asked whether they're concerned that Clinton's paid speeches from companies that lobbied for TPA could pose a conflict, campaign spokesman Brian Fallon said Clinton has "laid out the bar that needs to be met, to protect American workers, raise wages, and create more good jobs at home."

"So, consistent with what she's been saying on the issue, while this is still being negotiated, she will be watching closely to see what is being done to crack down on currency manipulation, improve labor rights, protect the environment and health, promote transparency, and open new opportunities for our small businesses to export overseas," he said.

Some Democrats are looking for a more definitive stance.

On Sunday Democratic presidential candidate and Vermont Senator Bernie Sanders was asked on CNN's "State of the Union" whether Clinton should take a position on trade and he said: "You can't be on the fence on this one. You're either for it or against."

Asked the same question on ABC's This Week, Senator Dianne Feinstein said, "I think it would be very helpful. I think it's been typified by our party in a way which is most unfortunate and that is on the jobs issue."

Corning Incorporated and eBay were among companies signing another letter from that same coalition in January 2015, urging passage of TPA. Clinton earned $225,000 in honoraria for a speech at Corning on July 29, 2014; and she earned $315,000 at a speech for eBay in San Jose, California on March 11, 2015 - her second to last before she stopped delivering paid speeches ahead of her presidential announcement.

Clinton had two paid appearances for Salesforce.com - one in Las Vegas on February 6, 2014 for $225,500 and another in San Francisco on October 14, 2014, where Clinton also earned $225,500. According to the Center for Responsive Politics, the company in 2014 and 2015 has lobbied on a number of trade related areas, including information technology trade issues, TPA and trade agreements. In a March letter to congressional committee leaders, Salesforce was among the software companies urging Congress to move quickly to pass updated TPA legislation with strong digital trade provisions.

What do independent voters think about foreign donations to the Clinton Foundation?

On October 8, 2014, Clinton earned $265,000 for an appearance in Chicago with the Advanced Medical Technology Association, or AdvaMed. According to the Center for Responsive Politics, the group has lobbied on issues related to global trade and the international competitiveness related to the medical device industry including TPA, The Trans Pacific Partnership (TPP) and the Transatlantic Trade and Investment Partnership (TTIP). When the House and Senate introduced TPA legislation in April to fast-track the trade deal, the group's CEO said in a statement, "The U.S. Trade Representative is currently working to advance priority issues for the medical technology industry as part of the Trans-Pacific Partnership (TPP) and the Transatlantic Trade and Investment Partnership (TTIP), both of which will greatly improve market access to medical technology in these regions."

One other group - the Institute of Scrap Recycling, where Clinton earned $225,000 for an April 10, 2014 speech - has also lobbied on trade issues, but its lobbying doesn't appear to be related to TPP, TTIP or TPA.

"It's not unusual for former elected officials to go out and give speeches and make a lot of money," said Noble. "What the problem now is that they're coming back into government after going out and having been paid large sums by these various special interests."

How Dubya Is Winning 2016 for Hillary // Daily Beast // Michael Tomasky - May 18, 2015

What a marvelous historical anomaly: Democrats are on the offense, and the GOPers sound like peaceniks on Iraq.

What a delightful week, watching Republicans not Democrats sink in the foreign-policy quicksand. For most of my adult lifetime—come to think of it, all of it, and pretty much all of my entire lifetime—to the extent that foreign policy has mattered in presidential campaigns, it's been brandished by Republicans to accuse the Democrats of being soft on whatever the supposed threat was at the time. To think that we might have a presidential campaign in which the Democrats are the ones playing foreign-policy offense, forcing the Republicans to profess that they are not war-mongering psychopaths, would be a thing to behold—as well as a measure, eight long years later, of how much damage George W. Bush and his co-belligerents did to the Republican Party.

It surely caught Jeb Bush by total surprise, the shitstorm that kicked up after his first answer about invading Iraq. Yes, he's rustier than a 1970s Plymouth; yes, he appears not to have been really quite listening to Megyn Kelly; and yes, it's beginning to dawn on all of us, God help us, that Dubya may have been the smart one.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But all those factors are subordinate to the main one, which is this: History instructs that if you're a Republican running for president and you're asked about a war, you probably can't go wrong by saying you're for it. A past war, a current war, a future war (perhaps these most of all!), it doesn't matter. Be pro-war, accuse the Democrats of wanting the United States to suckle at the teat of the UN and the new global order; and if it's a current war that's not going swimmingly, blame the Democrats and the anti-war elements at home. These are can't lose propositions.

Or were. This week, Bush learned otherwise. I know, specifically it had to do with the "knowing what we know now" language, which is what really cranked up the media's chainsaw. But public anti-war sentiment is even more blunt than that. Here for example is a question from a Quinnipiac poll last summer: "Do you think the result of the Iraq War was worth the loss of American lives and other costs of attacking Iraq, or not?" This does not say "knowing what we know now," which would clearly prod the respondent to think, "Oh, yeah, no WMD," and would be more likely to produce a higher "not worth it" result.

Now, the cowboys have to prove their solution to every problem isn't to invade it or bomb it.

But even keeping the WMD lie out of the conversation, not worth it won by 75-18 percent. Even Republicans said not worth it by 63-27.

It has created a new and perhaps not un- but let's say little-precedented default foreign-policy position in the American electorate: Now, the cowboys have to prove their solution to every problem isn't to invade it or bomb it. This may have been true for 1976 election, during the Vietnam hangover. But even if so, concerns about Vietnam were a distant second to unease about Richard Nixon's rape of the Constitution and Gerry Ford's pardon of him for doing it. Today, though, this question of reflexive Iraq hawkery is enough of a no-no that some people think Bush might already be sunk and should just quit now.

And this is why we saw Marco Rubio also reverse himself this week (although he would deny that) on the Iraq War. He used to defend the war, but now, with the new Kelly Standard in play, he decided he'd better come out and say: "Not only would I not have been in favor of it, President [George W.] Bush wouldn't have been in favor of it and he said so."

Rubio, of course, has neoconned himself to the gills, and there will be plenty of time for him during this primary season to come out swinging on Iran, once he figures out that Iran and ISIS are not allies. But that even he "clarified" his position in the anti-war direction says something.

Now I should note: It may not play out the way I'm describing during the primary campaign. Yes, as we saw above, rank-and-file Republicans said the Iraq War wasn't worth it by 63-27. But in the context of a primary season, that 27 can be as loud as or louder than the 63. It's probably the 27 who are more likely to vote or attend caucuses, which means the minority would have inordinate influence over the shape of the candidates' rhetoric.

But in a general-election context, the GOP nominee will probably have to tack back pretty quickly toward the anti-war position. This will give Hillary Clinton a great opportunity. For one thing, it'll weaken the salience of the whole "she can't defend the country cuz she's a girl" line of attack, which will come, however subtly. It will allow Clinton to define the terms of what constitutes a sensible foreign policy, and the Republican man will likely have to agree with her.

And most of all it will be a lot better for the world than if the situation were reversed. Contrary to liberals' deepest suspicions about her, she is not a neoconservative; she is not going to have regime change in Iran on her mind, which any of the Republicans as president would, except for Rand Paul.

Poor Republicans! Crime is down; they can't scream law and order. And now war is unpopular, so they can't say the Democrats are soft on whomever. Their economic theories are increasingly discredited. I guess that leaves the old standby: race-baiting. But we may have reached a point where that doesn't work anymore either. Should be an interesting race.

Labor Gives Clinton Room to Maneuver on Trade Talks // WSJ // Laura Meckler and Melanie Trottman - May 17, 2015

LAS VEGAS—Michael Collins, a nurse and active member of his local union, isn't happy about free-trade legislation being debated in Congress, believing it would undermine American workers. It won't, however, change his view of Hillary Clinton, a one-time booster of the pact.d

In the 2016 presidential race, "Hillary's about the only person we've got who's viable," he said.

Labor unions are fighting hard to defeat legislation that would authorize sped-up consideration of a trade agreement being negotiated with 11 Pacific Rim nations. However, they are giving Mrs. Clinton the kind of breathing room they aren't affording congressional Democrats or even the president.

Mrs. Clinton as a senator voted in support of several free-trade agreements, and opposed one, with Central American nations. As secretary of state, she supported the Pacific Rim negotiations, and her former boss, President Barack Obama, is leading the effort to approve them.

But in recent weeks, as the Trans-Pacific Partnership took center stage in the Senate and opened schisms within the Democratic Party, Mrs. Clinton has maintained steadfast neutrality. She issued one statement and answered one question on the matter. In neither case did she pick a side.

"Any trade deal has to produce jobs and raise wages and increase prosperity and protect our security," she told reporters in New Hampshire last month. "We have to do our part in making sure we have the capabilities and the skills to be competitive."

At a speech last month, AFL-CIO President Richard Trumka, the nation's most powerful labor leader, said any presidential candidates who seek labor's backing should oppose the trade deal. When asked after the speech if Mrs. Clinton was ducking on trade, he, too, avoided the question.

"I think she started off by doing what every candidate" should do, he said, by listening to voters in what will be a long campaign.

The Senate last week voted to move forward on a measure to accelerate a trade deal, setting the stage to approve a final bill as early as this week. But that push for fast-track legislation faces an even higher hurdle in the House, amid opposition from Democrats and many conservative Republicans.

A failure to secure congressional backing could imperil Mr. Obama's negotiations. Even if lawmakers do sign off, Congress could face a fractious debate when the actual trade deal comes back to both the full House and Senate for final approval as early as this fall.

People familiar with the Clinton campaign's thinking say she is determined to remain neutral for as long as possible, ideally until Congress resolves the issue.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mrs. Clinton has previously recalibrated her stance on free-trade agreements. In her 2003 memoir "Living History," she spoke approvingly of the North American Free Trade Agreement negotiated by her husband in the early 1990s. But as a presidential candidate in the 2008 race, she said the way Nafta was implemented "has hurt a lot of American workers."

On the current talks, the nation's labor leaders say trade is just one issue by which they will judge candidates. Many union leaders have longtime ties to Mrs. Clinton, and as long as she doesn't campaign for the agreement, they don't appear eager to bloody the Democrats' front-runner for the nomination.

"For us, an endorsement process is based on lots of different issues and lots of different variables," said Randi Weingarten, president of the American Federation of Teachers. She has said her union "has a long relationship with Hillary because of her long-standing support for working families."

The indifference stems in part from the changing nature of the labor movement, which over many years has filled its membership rolls with workers in government, hospitality and service jobs—fields less vulnerable to outsourcing than manufacturing jobs that once accounted for a large share of union membership. The United Auto Workers represented about 1.5 million workers in the late 1970s; today, its membership is about one-third of that. At the same time, membership in unions filled with public-sector workers has remained relatively stable.

"The great old unions of the past—the steelworkers, the auto workers—these unions are seen as shadows of themselves," said Gary Chaison, professor of industrial relations at Clark University in Worcester, Mass. On trade, "Hillary Clinton really does have much more ground to operate on, because it's not the issue it once was."

Even manufacturing unions won't criticize Mrs. Clinton on the issue, despite their vocal opposition to the trade bill itself.

"Right now, personally, there's no reason she should take a position on it," said Thomas Buffenbarger, president of the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers. "She's not a government official," he said.

At a recent SEIU Local 1107 meeting in Las Vegas, one member reported favorably to the group about Mrs. Clinton's remarks earlier in the day about immigration. Afterward, several workers said they weren't particularly concerned with trade. The Service Employees International Union represents a diverse range of public- and private-sector workers, including nurses, lab technicians, janitors and security guards.

Yvanna Cancela, political director of the Culinary Workers Local 226, which represents 55,000 workers, said her union stands with others in opposing the trade agreement. But she said the trade issue isn't likely to directly affect her members.

"We haven't widely discussed it within the membership," she said. "In prioritizing our political discussions, people want to hear about what affects them and their families."

At Ranchos High School, where Mrs. Clinton made her immigration comments, history teacher Reuben Silva, a member of the Clark County Education Association, said he leans toward favoring the agreement.

"Overall, it's good for America, especially in a globalized economy," said Mr. Silva, who voted for Mr. Obama twice.

Mrs. Clinton's silence isn't risk free. If she is seen as too supportive of trade, some of her supporters worry, a challenger could gain a foothold among Democratic voters and union activists. Both Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont, who is running for the Democratic nomination, and former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, who is expected to announce a bid, have railed against the agreement.

"The notion that we can somehow chase cheap labor abroad, send jobs abroad, and that helps our country, I think, is a falsehood we should wake up to," Mr. O'Malley told reporters last week in Manchester, N.H.

Asked about Mrs. Clinton's position on TPP, Mr. O'Malley said, "I don't know where she stands on that."

Hillary Clinton Pivots from Big Money to Small Business // Bloomberg // Jen Epstein – May 18, 2015

Three days after revealing that her own husband-and-wife cottage industry brought in more than $30 million since the start of 2014, Hillary Clinton arrives in Iowa on Monday to pitch herself as an advocate for small business.

For Clinton, who has not answered media questions in a month and who spent much of the last two weeks in New York and California raising millions of dollars for her presidential campaign from wealthy donors, including Beyonce, it's an opportunity to showcase her humble heartland roots and to reconnect with the "everyday people" that her campaign says are at the core of her candidacy.

Her financial disclosure form filed with the Federal Elections Committee late Friday showed how far she and her husband, former President Bill Clinton, have moved from that category, thanks largely to the couple's ability to command six-figure speaking fees.

"You can't be on the fence on this one."

Senator Bernie Sanders

Clinton's father, Hugh Rodham, owned a drapery business just outside Chicago, something she often mentions to remind voters that she wasn't always the person who until less than two months ago was taking in more than $200,000 a speech.

The trip to Iowa, as well as a return visit to New Hampshire on Friday, are chances for Clinton to appeal to Main Street and the centrist voters she'll need in the general election, after tacking left earlier this month on immigration and hinting that she plans to press for aggressive regulations on Wall Street.

Clinton, her campaign said, plans to outline ideas for cutting red tape for small businesses, expanding access to capital, finding tax relief for business owners and stimulating exports.

"We glad that she's focused on small business as a presidential candidate and we're eager to find out what she has in mind," said Jack Mozloom, the communications director of National Federation of Independent Business.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The group, which generally endorses Republican candidates, said that Clinton voted with its interests 25 percent of the time during her eight years in the Senate. "It's not the worst but she could do better from our perspective," Mozloom said.

Avoiding trade

But it's all while avoiding the issue Clinton has been dithering over for months: where she stand on the Trans-Pacific Partnership. The former secretary of state worked on the development of the TPP while serving in the Obama administration and wrote about it in positive terms in Hard Choices, the 2014 memoir for which she's earned at least $5 million and likely much more. On the campaign trail, however, Clinton has ducked the issue at every turn, aware that continued support would upset important Democratic constituencies on left, while opposition could undermine her former boss, President Barack Obama.

But the trade issue may prove difficult for Clinton to avoid, especially when discussing exports, and with the Senate slated to debate TPP this week.

Democrats on both sides of the issue aren't exactly aiding in her continued dodge.

On ABC's This Week Sunday, Senator Dianne Feinstein, an early backer of Clinton's presidential bid, argued that TPP will help the small businesses Clinton is touting this week. "I want to straighten one thing out, and that is that most people think this is a bill for corporate America," said the veteran Democrat, citing her home state. "In California, 95 percent of the trade is carried out by companies and business of less than 500 people."

Feinstein added that "it would be very helpful" for Clinton to take a position.

Clinton's challengers are piling on, too. Clinton should "absolutely" take a position, Senator Bernie Sanders, a Vermont independent who is seeking the Democratic party's presidential nomination, said on CNN's State of the Union. "You can't be on the fence on this one. You're either for it or you're against it." Sanders is against.

Not meeting the press

Finding out where Clinton stands hasn't been easy: The last time the Democratic frontrunner took questions from the press was four weeks ago today — April 20 in Keene, N.H. When she has spoken to reporters, it has been for a question or two at a time, generally shouted at the end of one of her roundtables. Her refusal to do the kind of extended press conference that would allow for follow up questions has led to protests from journalists and gibes from her Republican rivals. At an Iowa Republican dinner over the weekend Senators Rand Paul and Lindsey Graham and former Hewlett Packard CEO all mocked Clinton for refusing to meet the press.

Fiorina said she's taken more than 300 on-the-record questions from the media since launching her campaign two weeks ago. Clinton, according to media accounts, has taken somewhere between nine and 13.

Correct the Record, the new super PAC supporting Clinton's campaign, has issued a tally documenting more than 100 questions Clinton has taken from "everyday people."

"The Republican candidates are spending their time talking to reporters with cameras, while Hillary Clinton is talking to people across the country about the issues that affect them every day, all to figure out how she can help make their lives better. That's what leaders do," said the group's Mary Jennings.

But thus far, Clinton's interlocutors have been members of the small, carefully vetted audiences at her heavily stage-managed events.

On NBC's Meet the Press Sunday, fellow Democrat, longtime Obama adviser David Axelrod, urged his party's would-be standard-bearer to hold a press conference.

"She has to do it quickly and she has to start getting into the rhythm of a campaign where she's out there, she's answering questions," Axelrod said. "It would be a terrible mistake not to do that."

Bernie Sanders casts Hillary Clinton as newcomer to income fight // CNN // Eric Bradner - May 17, 2015

Washington (CNN)Democratic presidential contender Bernie Sanders is portraying his rival Hillary Clinton a newcomer to the left's fight against income inequality.

"It's one thing to talk about it. It's one thing to act on it," the Vermont senator said during an interview with CNN's Brianna Keilar aired Sunday on "State of the Union."

"You are looking at the most progressive member of the United States Senate," he said, touting his relationship as a "good friend" of firebrand Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren.

Sanders said he's led efforts to challenge Wall Street, push for universal health care, tackle climate change and combat "disastrous trade agreements."

He also said Clinton should take a position on the Trans-Pacific Partnership, a massive 12-country deal that President Barack Obama is pushing to the dismay of liberals.

"You can't be on the fence of this one," he said. "You're either for it or you're against it. No fence-sitting on this one."

Sanders said he personally likes Clinton. He said he's willing to challenger her on policy issues -- but that he hopes media will cover those differences without Sanders having to launch "reckless attacks."

"Are you in the media prepared to allow us to engage in that serious debate?" he said. "Or do I have to get media attention by simply making reckless attacks on Hillary Clinton or anybody else? I don't believe in that. I believe in serious debates on serious issues."

Bernie Sanders: 'Maybe I shouldn't say this: I like Hillary Clinton' // The Guardian // Martin Pengelly - May 17, 2015

Bernie Sanders, the independent Vermont senator who is running for the Democratic presidential nomination on 2016, on Sunday denied that he would be a “spoiler” for the electoral chances of the establishment favourite and said: “Maybe I shouldn’t say this: I like Hillary Clinton.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sanders also asked if the media would “allow us to have a serious debate”, and said: “Or is the only way you get media attention by ripping apart somebody else?”

Clinton is the clear frontrunner for the Democratic nomination to succeed Barack Obama in the White House, polling well over 50% ahead of Sanders, the only other declared candidate, and potential contenders such as former Maryland governor Martin O’Malley and the former Virginia senator Jim Webb.

Sanders, a self-declared “democratic socialist” who has repeatedly championed social reform on a Scandinavian model and attacked the influence and behaviour of the wealthiest sections of society, appeared on CNN. He was asked how he differed from Clinton on income inequality, a key issue in both campaigns so far.

“It’s one thing to talk about it, it’s one thing to act on it,” Sanders said. “I have been helping to lead the fight for the American middle class for the last 25 or 30 years … in the Senate I am leading the effort to raise the minimum wage up to $15 an hour so that people who work 40 hours a week will not be living in poverty.

“We have presented legislation that will say to the wealthiest people and the largest corporations, ‘You know what? You can’t continue to avoid paying your fair share of taxes.”

Sanders was asked if he would have a “civil debate” with Clinton in the months to come, given her status as a member of the political establishment he said he did not represent, and given that she has been widely criticised on matters regarding her wealth. On Friday she and her husband, former president Bill Clinton, said they had earned more than $25m in speaking fees since January 2014.

“I’ve never run a negative political ad in my life,” Sanders said. “…I believe in serious debates on serious issues. I’ve known Hillary Clinton for 25 years. Maybe I shouldn’t say this: I like Hillary Clinton. I respect Hillary Clinton.

“Will the media, among others, allow us to have a civil debate on civil issues? Or is the only way you get media attention by ripping apart somebody else?”

Sanders did say Clinton should indicate her position on the proposed Trans Pacific Partnership trade deal which is dividing Democrats and forcing Obama to depend on Republican support in Congress.

“You’re either for or you’re against it,” he said. “There’s no fence-sitting on this one.”

Sanders is against the agreement, which he says would be “disastrous” for middle-class American jobs.

Clinton has not committed herself. Last month her campaign chief, John Podesta, was quoted as having told donors: “Can you make it go away?”

Axelrod: "Terrible Mistake" For Hillary Clinton Not To Take Questions From Media, "She's Got To Get Out There" // Real Clear Politics // May 17, 2015

On Sunday's Meet the Press, former Obama campaign advisor and MSNBC contributor David Axelrod criticized presidential candidate Hillary Clinton for dodging media questions on the Clinton Foundation controversy.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Part of that is because a lot of the questions were about the Clinton Foundation and they made a decision to let him handle those questions," Axelrod told moderator Chuck Todd. "But look, I think she has got to get out there, she has to answer questions. And she has to do it routinely so it's not a major news event when she takes a few questions from the news media."

NBC's Chuck Todd noted since she has become a candidate, Hillary Clinton has only taken 9 questions on camera while her husband, former President Bill Clinton, has taken 39.

"It does make Bill Clinton, right now, the face of the Clinton campaign, in an odd way," Todd said. "He hasn't been helpful."

> CHUCK TODD, MEET THE PRESS: I'm starting off with a retort that is becoming familiar with Republicans, David Axelrod, which is this: When is Hillary Clinton going to answer questions from the media? We did our own math here. What's been amazing is since Hillary Clinton became an official candidate for president, there has been a Clinton that has taken quite a few questions on camera. Bill Clinton has taken 39 questions on camera, that includes Letterman, our Cynthia McFadden, also a CNN interview. Hillary Clinton is up to 9. NPR puts it up to 13 because of a question right there (on screen).

Peggy Noonan On Hillary's Press Strategy: 'She's Running A Silent Movie Of A Campaign' // Daily Caller // Al Weaver - May 17, 2015

Wall Street Journal columnist Peggy Noonan took aim at the former secretary of state Hillary Clinton's media strategy Sunday, telling "Face The Nation" Clinton is "running a silent movie of a campaign" as she dodges the press.

Noonan made the comments to host Bob Schieffer after giving credit to former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush for continuing to take questions from the media after he endured a tough week. Bush waffled on questions about the Iraq War.

BOB SCHIFFER: Peggy, this was a tough week for Jeb Bush. PEGGY NOONAN: Yeah, It definitely was. He seemed consistently taken aback by the asking of a question anyone could have told you a year and two years ago was going to be primary question of the primary time. It was difficult for him in ways that are almost mysterious. And because I think he showed such discomfort in his answers, he sort of opened up the possibility that this will only be the beginning of many questions about things your brother did, would you have done them? Do you know what I mean? So, it was difficult. However, he deserves, I think, great credit in this. He's going to the press every day, he's taking questions, he's being out there, he's doing sit-down interviews. Mrs. Clinton instead is doing, sort of, a silent movie of a campaign in which she doesn't feel she has to do those things. I don't think that's a good way to go and will problematic for her down the road.

Bill And Hillary Clinton Rob Inequality Of Its Unrelenting Beauty // Forbes // John Tamny - May 17, 2015

In a McDonald's recently, a witnessed interview between the restaurant's manager and a potential new hire was striking for its economic significance. At one point the manager went back behind the counter to help with a surge of customers, at which time the interviewee took out her mobile phone to send texts, read e-mails, check Facebook...

Interesting about what took place is that 35 years ago cellphones were non-existent. Worse, as the Competitive Enterprise Institute's Bill Frezza regularly reminds those lucky enough to hear him speak, in the 1970s wall-mounted telephones were illegal to own. If you wanted a phone your only option was to rent it from the federal government's approved telephone monopoly.

Thirty years ago mobile phones were finally available, but only the superrich owned them. That was true because the purchase of a brick-sized phone with ½ hour of battery life, terrible reception, and highly limited calling range set the wealthy few back $3,995. If you had the temerity to call San Diego from Los Angeles with any frequency your monthly bill was measured in the hundreds of dollars. Nowadays McDonald's applicants can cheaply call anywhere around the country on phones with capabilities that would have floored the richest technology billionaires, Hollywood movie producers and Connecticut hedge fund managers no more than five years ago.

The above is of course the norm in societies defined by personal and economic freedom. What the rich initially enjoy exclusively merely signals what we'll all eventually enjoy if the economy is left alone. It's forever been this way, and the evidence is all around us.

The 'Mansion' section of a recent Wall Street Journal featured a 'car garage' for sale as an apartment on East 73rd Street in Manhattan. As the Journal noted about the $50 million Beaux-Arts structure, it "was built around 1905, when only the elite had cars." Henry Ford grew very rich making the Ford Model T accessible to the non-rich; Ford's cars powered by gasoline made broadly available by the richest man of all time, John D. Rockefeller.

Fast forward to the present, an overnight stay at supposedly down market lodging chains like Motel 6 includes not just air conditioning, but a flat screen television in each room. In the year 2000 a ''50 flat-screen television cost $20,000, and even the rooms at luxury chains like the Four Seasons were bereft of them. There's a detectable pattern here.

Specifically, the 'wealth inequality' decried by clueless economists and opportunistic politicians has been mis-named. What's a pejorative is unrelentingly beautiful. The "rising wealth inequality" that reduces economists, pundits and politicians to puddles of emotion should be properly renamed "surging lifestyle equality" with an eye on calming their rage. Put more simply, the inequality that horrifies self-proclaimed deep thinkers is the wondrous process whereby entrepreneurs turn the former luxuries of the rich into everyday items. To be blunt, a world without wealth inequality would be one marked by excessive deprivation.

All of which brings us to the latest news about Bill and Hillary Clinton. According to numerous media accounts the formidable political couple has earned at least $30 million in speaking fees since 2014. The Clintons are maybe who President Obama had in mind when he famously said "You didn't build that."

The Clintons are extraordinarily rich not because Bill discovered a cure for cancer, or because Hillary has a knack for resuscitating companies that are on the proverbial deathbed, because both are expert as Ford, Rockefeller and

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Steve Jobs were at mass producing former baubles of the rich, or even because they were born well. No, the Clintons are rich for having been wise enough to make a profession of politics in what is the richest, most innovative country on earth. Without a hint of hyperbole, the wealth they enjoy is a function of their pull within a federal government that is empowered to tax away trillions on an annual basis. The Clintons are posh and supercilious, but their grand posture is directly attributable to the political class's ability to plunder the actual wealth of America's truly productive.

The Clinton's millions are the result of government force, and those millions rob inequality of its life-enhancing beauty. While rising wealth inequality in the world of free markets is once again a sign of entrepreneurs shrinking the lifestyle gap, Clinton-style inequality is rooted in the political ability to influence the direction of economic resources created by others, but that were expropriated by the federal government.

To be fair to the Clintons, they're hardly alone. This isn't a Democrat or Republican thing. It's a national politics thing. Politicians claim to enter what is nowadays a profession with 'public service' in mind, but as their soaring net worth in and out office plainly reveals, men and women enter politics in the U.S. to get rich. As evidenced by their earnings, the Clintons are simply the best at a game played by Democrats and Republicans alike. Maybe an unsung reason why Americans despise politicians so much has to do with intuitive knowledge that their arrogance is entirely unearned.

Bill Clinton is by most accounts an accomplished speaker, both Bill and Hillary are presumably very book smart, but if they weren't born in the U.S. such that they could play U.S. politics at the highest of levels, no one would presently pay them six and seven figures for their speeches. The Clintons oddly decry the very inequality that creates a taxable bonanza each year for the federal government, and this is odd simply because the resulting federal spending is the undeniable source of all the fawning treatment they receive from people who are always 'fascinated' by what they have to say on the stump. Reduced to the basics, there aren't many rich people in Bangladesh, and as a result there aren't many influential people seeking favor with their politicians. Politicians from Bangladesh are for some strange reason not as interesting or insightful as are American politicians. They're also not as rich....There's no bustling, ritzy, K Street equivalent in Dhaka.

Hillary Clinton's decision to make her presidential campaign about the alleged horrors of inequality despite her and Bill's many millions has her being labeled by many as a hypocrite. Fair enough, but this amounts to shooting fish in the most crowded of barrels.

What's most bothersome is that Hillary would bash the very inequality that has made it possible for her and Bill to be prominent global figures, and by extension wildly rich global figures. If not for the immense taxable wealth in the U.S., and the Clintons' ability to influence its direction around the world, very few would give them the time of day.

In short, the Clintons are nothing without the wealth inequality they claim to disdain. It's the sole source of their power. The swagger of the world's foremost political couple was taken from someone else.

Hillary Clinton's consigliere covers up her scandals // NY Post // Paul Sperry - May 17, 2015

If Congress really wants to get to the bottom of Hillary Clinton's missing Benghazi and pay-to-play emails, it should call her consigliere Cheryl D. Mills to testify — under oath, and under the klieg lights.

A hearing featuring Clinton will be a wasted show trial with a lot of political grandstanding.

But Mills, who served as the former secretary of state's chief of staff and counselor, knows where the bodies are buried. After all, Hillary tasked her with “identifying and preserving all emails that could potentially be federal records.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And, presumably, deleting.

Mills has a long track record of hiding Clinton documents.

Since the 1990s, Mills has been at Hillary’s side — first as a White House lawyer, then as her closest and most loyal adviser at the State Department, and now as a key member of the Clinton Foundation board, which is under fire for raking in hundreds of millions of dollars from dubious foreign sources in alleged influence-peddling deals.

The job of damage control has fallen to Mills through a parade of scandals. Her lack of cooperation is legendary. In fact, she’s been officially accused of both perjury and obstruction of justice.

Sworn affidavits, depositions and court rulings, as well as congressional reports and testimony, paint a picture of, to put it charitably, a brazenly dishonest cover-up specialist.

Among her shenanigans:

· As White House deputy counsel, Mills ordered Commerce Department officials to “withhold” from investigators emails and other documents detailing then-President Clinton’s and First Lady Hillary Clinton’s allegedly illegal selling of seats on foreign trade junkets for campaign cash, according to sworn statements by Commerce’s former FOIA chief. “Ms. Mills, in her position as deputy counsel to the president, advised Commerce officials to withhold certain documents,” testified Sonya Stewart Gilliam in a July 2000 sworn affidavit taken by Judicial Watch, a government watchdog group in Washington. “The Commerce Department’s collaboration with White House Deputy Counsel Mills on these matters was, in my experience, highly irregular and at variance with normal procedures.

· At the same time, a federal judge ruled that Mills “failed miserably” to take proper steps to search for and recover 1.8 million Executive Office of the President and Office of the First Lady emails under subpoena in the Monica Lewinsky and Filegate scandal investigations, after computer contractors discovered them mysteriously missing from the automated White House archiving system. Mills, who was in charge of finding the lost email, conveniently made “the most critical error” in recovering them, US District Judge Royce Lamberth concluded in a 63-page opinion, adding that he found her actions “loathsome.” In fact, Judicial Watch accused Mills of orchestrating a “cover-up” in what became known as “Email-gate.” Her court testimony in the case, during which she repeatedly answered “I don’t have a recollection,” sounds like an interview with an amnesia patient. (In the end, the emails were never recovered).

· In another scandal, Mills “concealed” so many subpoenaed emails and other documents detailing allegedly illegal fundraising activity between the White House and the Democratic National Committee — specifically, Hillary’s illegal integration of White House and DNC computer databases — that staff lawyers for the House Government Oversight Committee in 1998 sent a criminal referral to the Justice Department demanding federal prosecutors charge Mills with obstruction of justice and perjury. “Ms. Mills knowingly and willfully obstructed the investigative authority of this committee by withholding documents,” the panel concluded in a 647-page investigative report. “Moreover, when this obstruction was brought to light in a hearing before the committee, Ms. Mills lied under oath about the documents and the circumstances surrounding their nonproduction.”

· In October 2012, Mills sorted through key Benghazi documents and decided which ones to withhold from an independent review board. She also leaned on witnessses. Deputy ambassador to Libya Gregory Hicks testified before Congress in 2013 that Mills told him in an angry phone call to stop cooperating with investigators.

· On behalf of the Clintons, Mills negotiated the weak conflict-of-interest rules for disclosing foreign donations to the Clinton Foundation with the Obama administration. She also reportedly helped broker international payments to the group.

In short, Mills “is in the middle of it,” Judicial Watch President Tom Fitton said.

An investigator with the House Select Committee on Benghazi said if the panel calls Mills as a witness, her testimony will most likely be taken behind closed doors in a “transcribed interview.” That would be a mistake.

Mills should be sworn in and grilled in a public hearing in front of TV cameras.

Sweating Mills could crack the case wide open. Otherwise, Hillary could walk away unscathed, waltz right back into the White House — and Mills could end up running it as chief of staff.

It's the Summer of Hillary Clinton on "SNL" // NBC New York // Michael Rodio - May 17, 2015

Summer is only a calendar page away. But nevermind the sunny skies and balmy breezes: the season of straw polls and caucuses has arrived, and Hillary Clinton was in campaign mode on "Saturday Night Live."

In the musical opening sketch, the former senator and secretary of state (portrayed in her latest "SNL" incarnation by a manic, delightfully unhinged Kate McKinnon) took to beaches and sand castles to introduce herself to a younger generation.

"May I have just a moment of your summer? I'm Hillary Clinton and I'm running for president of these United States," said Clinton, clawing at the air, her hands like pincers.

"But that's not for a long time," one (Kenan Thompson) said. "Now it's summer vacation."

"My last vacation was in 1953," she replied. "I played one round of hopscotch with a friend. I found it tedious. Why hop when you can march — straight to the White House."

She then issued her percussive laugh — something like "ah HA HA haaaaaa" — as her mouth curled into a snarling rictus.

She spoke with some kids (Aidy Bryant and Pete Davidson), whose parents remained resolutely against her political aspirations.

"I like your sand castle," she said.

"Thanks," Bryant's character replied. "It's our dream house."

"That's nice. This is my dream house," Clinton said, embracing a massive, sandy model of the White House.

Also on the campaign trail were a few surfers (Kyle Mooney, Jay Pharoah and Beck Bennett).

“Hey there, 18-to-25-year-olds," she said, stiffly hula-twisting up to a surfboard. "How does it hang?”

Blank stares.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"You know what's cool? In two years I'll be 69," Clinton said. (More blank stares). "You like that? Bill told me to tell that to young males."

The former president made a brief appearance himself (in the person of longtime "SNL" impersonator Darrell Hammond), if only to help a young woman (Sasheer Zamata) apply sunscreen.

"Billary Rodham Clinton, what are you doing?" the former first lady hissed at her husband.

"Sorry," Mr. Clinton told Zamata's character. "It's my mom."

The Clintons weren't the only political dynasty to take some flak on Saturday night. On "Weekend Update," co-host Colin Jost skewered Jeb Bush for his fumbled responses to questions related to his brother's record in Iraq.

"Jeb Bush said in an interview this week that, like his brother, he would have authorized the invasion of Iraq," Jost said. "But he wouldn't have done it for the same George did: to capture the genie from Aladdin."

Jost also noted that Jeb Bush faced criticism during a Nevada town hall meeting, where a college student said George W. Bush "created ISIS."

"But that's really not fair," Jost said. "It's more like he co-created it," as a photo of Bush and former Vice President Dick Cheney appeared.

Diane Lane on Her Aborted Hillary Clinton Miniseries and Surviving Hollywood // The Daily Beast // Marlow Stern - May 17, 2015

“I was a complete anomaly,” says Diane Lane. “It was almost like a freak show to see a kid in the movies in the ’70s, and now it’s all kids.”

Yes, back in 1979, Lane was featured on the cover of Time magazine and christened one of Hollywood’s “Whiz Kids.” She’d just made her Broadway debut at the age of 12 in The Cherry Orchard opposite Meryl Streep when film icon Laurence Olivier fought with producers to get her out of her theatrical obligations so he could cast her in A Little Romance. Olivier, as is his wont, got his way, and after working with Lane christened her “the new Grace Kelly.”

Lane went on to star as the lone ballsy female in Francis Ford Coppola’s testosterone-fueled teen flicks The Outsiders and Rumble Fish before seguing to more adult roles, earning a well-deserved Oscar nomination for her turn as an unfulfilled housewife who embarks on a steamy affair with a sexy Frenchman in Unfaithful.

Her latest film is Every Secret Thing. Directed by Oscar-nominated documentarian Amy Berg, Lane stars as Helen Manning, the mother of a young girl, Alice (Danielle Macdonald), who’s—along with her alleged accomplice, Ronnie (Dakota Fanning)—hauled off to jail at a young age for a heinous crime. When she’s released seven years later, another young girl goes missing, and the two young women are the prime suspects.

The Daily Beast spoke with Lane about her new film and storied career, including her highly publicized—and ultimately canceled—turn as Hillary Clinton in the four-part NBC miniseries Hillary.

How did you get involved with Every Secret Thing?

I'm a Frances McDormand fan, and it was her connection as a producer on it that sparked my interest first. And then I read the book, which was a fun, unexpected read. You get to see behind the scenes of mass confusion in the justice system. Nicole Holofcener, who wrote the screenplay, was going to direct it at one point, so I met with her and I'm a fan of hers, and then we hit a lot of snags with our schedules, so Fran found Amy [Berg] to direct, who was just this wunderkind. For me, the territory of this character was fascinating because I felt that her failure as a mother was the first domino in how such a horrible crime could take place, and the ensuing drama of the girls coming out of incarceration as adults. How do you look for a job? It's all rather daunting.

This is a much darker turn—and film—for you. I remember around the time of Nights of Rodanthe you'd been vocal about your frustration with being typecast as a sunny character.

Well, yeah. Opportunity is key. They don't make a lot of these, for whatever reason. I just thought it was a breath of fresh air to allow for the female experience to have nothing to do with the prerequisite sympathetic or nurturing presumptions. That's a mask that we want to see. I understand a lot of people want to go and believe in fairytales, and that's great and a big part of the entertainment industry, but there are other appetites that are more interested in the psychology. From my point of view, playing someone like this is definitely more of a hurdle—and also not, in a way. After so many years of being rather sunny, as you say, it's refreshing to examine what's not so "popular" about what exists in people.

Every Secret Thing is also a Hollywood rarity in that it's almost entirely made by women. It's written by Nicole Holofcener, directed by Amy Berg, stars you, Dakota Fanning, and Danielle Macdonald. Hell, even the lead detective in the film is a woman, played by Elizabeth Banks.

Yeah! And Laura Lippman wrote the book, too. I don't think it was intended that way, but I think there's a need for society to not just keep the female experience in the narrow confines of what's appealing. Only living on candy is not a good thing, you know?

I totally agree. Now, I want to talk about Hillary, the aborted NBC miniseries that was supposed to air sometime in 2014 and star you as Hillary Clinton. What story was it going to tell?

It was going to start with the Monica Lewinsky morning-after. Waking up to that news had to be quite a morning in their house! And then it continued on until she was embarking on her presidential bid.

It seems pretty prescient, given that the series was green-lit back in 2013 and Hillary only recently declared she'd be running for POTUS in 2016.

Well… I remember going with my daughter to sit down and vote for a woman [in the 2008 primary], because I never knew that the opportunity would present itself again—just so she'd have the experience as a young person to say that it happened. And hopefully for her, it will become a commonplace option.

Why do you think it was canceled? I read stories about NBC receiving pressure from the Republican National Committee, who'd voted to boycott NBC during the 2016 presidential primary debates when Hillary was announced.

You know, I suspect that it's possible that nobody wanted to fathom that a film could impact the psyche of the demographics who would be potential voters—meaning in one direction or another. I think it became about,

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Wow, are we going to make a ‘pro’ or an ‘anti’ film?” “Are we going to elucidate aspects that will detract from the more important issues, or are we going to create speculation about things that are distracting from the agenda of the future of our country?” I do think there was cause for concern, because honestly, does anyone want to be a grain of sand tipping the scale in either direction? Only in hindsight can we guess the impact of media on the mentality of the voting body.

It was going to be a pretty positive portrayal of Hillary though, right?

I never got to see the final script. We only created an outline that was to be filled in, but we never got to the point that there was an actual screenplay. We did have an outline, though. I mean her whole life, depending on your opinion, is a positive or a negative. Are you anti things that she’s done or what she represents, or are you pro what she represents and the things that she’d done? But the one thing that I don’t think they can take away from Hillary is her experience. That’s a different conversation, but as far as that project, it was a fun, exciting, risk-taking moment for me to allow them to announce! It was so much larger than the project already; it was so unwieldy. I think we all were spared—everyone involved!

The first thing I ever saw you in was The Outsiders. Half of ’80s Hollywood is in that movie, and yours is really the only prominent female role.

It’s so interesting because it was all for the love of a woman. It’s like Helen of Troy, in a sense. What women represent to the male is, historically, a big burden. It’s a lovely dream but it’s the stuff of literature, art, and everything. Living up to what the male psyche projects onto the female is the stuff of books. You’d need a lot more than an interview to go into it! But at the time it was really the only film besides Bugsy Malone that was an art film for teenagers. It went deeper.

Tom Cruise must’ve taken a liking to you on that film, because I read that he asked you to star in Risky Business with him while you two were shooting The Outsiders.

That’s true. That’s true. My Dad was like, “There’s no way you’re playing a prostitute for that guy.”

He said that?!

[Laughs] Absolutely!

But then you almost played a prostitute later in Pretty Woman.

Oh, yeah. But that was a very different film, you have to understand. It was a movie called 3000, and it was a dark, dark psychological drama about a delusional prostitute who gets kicked out of a limousine at the end of the movie. They took that film and they dignified it, you know? She was not getting any jewelry. She might’ve for the weekend, but it was Cinderella-time.

So the version of Pretty Woman you’d signed onto was about a rich asshole playing mind games with a prostitute and convincing her that he loved her, only to kick her to the curb?

Correct. And every actress in town was auditioning in her underwear for that movie. It was a very uncomfortable time for everyone. Auditioning for Pretty Baby was pretty bad, too. It was a screen test, and I hated it. I get uncomfortable in my body now just remembering it. The fact that you go on meetings and hope you don’t get the part is always an awkward time.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

How have you managed to stay relevant in this pretty sexist industry that tends to cast aside women of a certain age?

Part of that is the psyche I was talking about earlier that men project and filter the female experience through. I was watching a documentary awhile back about pedophilia—at least I thought it was going to be about that—and it turned out that the males of our species invariably go for the youngest opportunity because, in our DNA, that meant you could have the most babies for longer. I don't take it personally anymore. I think it's a default, and leftover. It's like our fingernails; we don't use them for much anymore.

I gotta ask about Batman v. Superman: Dawn of Justice, because the trailer came out recently and everyone lost their shit.

Oh, that's done. We shot that last year. I'm Martha Kent again. I'm not really allowed to talk about it! It's one of those movies. Scenes were redacted! It was very hush-hush. I don't even know a lot of the movie myself! I didn't participate in a lot of green screen, though. My scenes were very earthbound, and normal.

Did you get to observe Ben Affleck as Batman? People are very curious how he'll be as the Dark Knight.

Oh, yeah. It certainly impressed the hell outta me! I thought he was brilliantly cast. I love Ben, and I worked with him years ago on a film called Hollywoodland, and he played the actor playing Superman in that! It's all so confusing and incestuous and curious, the trail that actors wander through in the course of their careers and how stories overlap. It's funny.

Unions Pour Millions into Clinton Foundation // AP // Bill McMorris - May 18, 2015

Big labor funneled millions of dollars in dues money to the Clinton Foundation, according to a new report.

The National Institute for Labor Relations Research (NILRR), a union watchdog group, traced at least $2 million in donations from multiple union organizations and affiliates.

"U.S. Department of Labor's union financial disclosure reports reveal that Big Labor gave at least $2,034,500 in union general treasury funds to Clinton Foundations. Union treasuries are funded mostly by compulsory union dues or fees collected from workers who would be fired for refusing to pay," the NILRR report says. "As Mrs. Clinton became closer to her current run for president, donations amounts appear to have increased."

The Clintons have turned their foundation into a lucrative "slush fund," according to one charity watchdog group, and have received hundreds of millions of dollars from notable businesses, media personalities, and political luminaries. The family has maintained that none of those donations influenced her decisions as secretary of state and that the money is strictly philanthropic.

However, unions did not necessarily agree about the apolitical nature of the donations, according to NILRR.

"Some of these 'donations' are categorized by the unions as 'political' on their financial disclosure report" to the Labor Department, the report says.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices, a national plumbers union, for example, poured in nearly $200,000 through two contributions in 2013; each of those donations was classified as a political activity.

The AFL-CIO, one of the nation's most influential labor groups, contributed $23,000 to the Clinton Global Initiative in 2012 and reported the donation as a political activity. The union lobbied the State Department several times about pending free trade agreements over the course of the year.

Neither the United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices nor the AFL-CIO returned a request for comment.

Clinton gave a tepid endorsement of the Trans-Pacific Partnership trade deal being negotiated by the Obama administration in her memoir Hard Choices, but has backed away from that position since declaring her presidential candidacy.

A Washington Free Beacon review found that all of the donations unearthed by NILRR were accounted for in the public disclosures that Hillary Clinton pledged to make when she joined the Obama administration. She and the foundation have faced scrutiny for not properly living up to that pledge by author Peter Schweizer, the New York Times, Washington Free Beacon, and numerous other media outlets.

Neither the Clinton Foundation, nor the Clinton campaign returned request for comment.

Patrick Semmens, spokesman for the National Right to Work, said the donations fit into the pattern of Big Labor's political influence peddling.

"Once again union bosses are playing politics with rank-and-file workers' money, including money from workers who would be fired if they didn't pay," he said "There's no question the union officials view two million dollars as a down-payment towards making sure that a Hillary Administration will continue the Obama policy of wielding Executive power to benefit Big Labor at the expense of independent workers and businesses."

Stephanopoulos, ABC have not fully disclosed Clinton ties: Schweizer // USA Today // Peter Schweizer - May 17, 2015

Fact-driven, fair, aggressive journalism animates American politics. As an investigative journalist, I am accustomed to asking tough questions. When I publish, I expect tough questions in turn,

That's not what ABC News This Week host and chief anchor George Stephanopoulos delivered when he interviewed me about my new book on the Clinton Foundation last month. There's a reason. Though Stephanopoulos belatedly disclosed$75,000 in donations to the foundation, he has yet to disclose his much deeper relationship with the Clinton Foundation.

When Stephanopoulos invited me on his Sunday program, I knew that he had worked as a top adviser and campaign manager to President Bill Clinton in the 1990s, but I didn't know about his donations or his other ties to the foundation founded and overseen by the former president and his wife, potential future president Hillary Clinton.

I agreed to be interviewed, expecting a robust examination of my new book, Clinton Cash, and my reporting on the Clintons' accumulation of massive personal wealth, cronyism and the lack of transparency surrounding the Clintons' foundation.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I expected probing questions, similar to the ones I've received from Andrea Mitchell on MSNBC, Chris Wallace on Fox News and Frank Sesno on CNN.

What I did not expect — what no one expected — was the sort of "hidden hand journalism" that has contributed to America's news media's crisis of credibility in particular, and Americans' distrust of the news media more broadly.

If Stephanopoulos had disclosed his donations to the very foundation I was there to talk about, perhaps it would have put the aggressive posture of his interview with me in context.

But he didn't.

And even though he has apologized to his viewers for keeping this information from both his audience and his bosses, there is much that Stephanopoulos has yet to disclose to his viewers. Indeed, far from being a passive donor who strokes Clinton Foundation checks from afar, a closer look reveals that Stephanopoulos is an ardent and engaged Clinton Foundation advocate.

For example, in his on air apology for this ethical mess, Stephanopoulos did not disclose that in 2006 he was a featured attendee and panel moderator at the annual meeting of the Clinton Global Initiative (CGI).

He did not disclose that in 2007, he was a featured attendee at the CGI annual meeting, a gathering also attended by several individuals I report on in Clinton Cash, including mega Clinton Foundation donors Lucas Lundin, Frank Giustra, Frank Holmes, and Carlos Slim — individuals whose involvement with the Clintons I assumed he had invited me on his program to discuss.

Stephanopoulos did not disclose that he was a 2008 panelist at the CGI annual meeting which, once again, featured individuals I report on in the book, such as billionaire Clinton Foundation foreign donor Denis O'Brien.

ABC's most visible news employee did not disclose that in 2009, he served as a panel moderator at CGI's annual meeting, nor did he disclose that in 2010 and 2011, he was an official CGI member.

Stephanopoulos did not disclose that in 2013 and 2014, he and Chelsea Clinton served as CGI contest judges for awards, in part, underwritten by Laureate International Universities — a for-profit education company I report on in the book. Bill Clinton was on its payroll until his recent resignation.

Obviously, Stephanopoulos has favorable feelings toward Hillary and Bill Clinton; he gives their foundation his money and his time. Big-time news media personalities have one thing in very short supply — time. Regular participation in Clinton Foundation events shows a deeper commitment to the Clintons than just the donations.

Perhaps if Stephanopoulos weren't so close to the subject of my book, he might have asked me about my reporting on Hillary Clinton's brother, Tony Rodham, serving on the board of a company that scored a coveted and rare gold mining permit in Haiti as the Clintons directed the flow of U.S. Agency for International Development dollars. (As The Washington Post reported, Rodham met those mining executives at a CGI meeting.)

Indeed, Stephanopoulos could have pounded away at all the book's news. He chose not to. Instead, he made sure to highlight the four months I wrote speeches for President George W. Bush and my long past financial supporters, all while keeping quiet about his deep and longstanding involvement in the Clintons' foundation, and the three annual checks for $25,000 that he wrote.

What ABC News' top anchor has done is far different than the "honest mistake" ABC called it in a statement earlier this week.

I asked ABC News about the fact that this information was yet to be disclosed to ABC viewers, and mostly they avoided my questions, releasing a statement that reads in full, "Yes, George made us aware that he was moderating these panels and that is absolutely within our guidelines. We know that he would be listed as a member — as all moderators are. He is in good company of scores of other journalists that have moderated these panels."

That, however, is not at all what the Clinton Foundation website says about CGI membership. Read for yourself. Whether ABC News will ultimately punish Stephanopoulos is unclear.

What is certain is that Stephanopoulos' ethical malpractice and hidden-hand journalism have done further injury to an essential, if beleaguered, institution, one already battling to preserve legitimacy.

That's news no one can celebrate.

Clinton's super PAC fundraising irks progressives // CNN // MJ Lee – May 18, 2015

Clinton campaigns in Council Bluffs, Iowa, with her daughter, Chelsea, on January 1, 2008, two days ahead of the January 3 state caucus.

(CNN)Hillary Clinton's decision to personally raise money for a super PAC supporting her campaign is agitating her progressive critics, who see the move as further proof that the Democratic presidential frontrunner doesn't share some of their values.

There was never any expectation that Clinton would renounce super PAC money this election cycle. But liberal activists determined to use the Democratic primary to pressure Clinton to embrace a progressive agenda say the idea of the former secretary of state personally wooing the wealthiest class of donors runs counter to the populist rhetoric she's employed this year.

Within days of announcing her White House bid, Clinton had called out wealthy investors for paying too little in taxes and pledged to get big money out of politics. At the time, it was a welcome message for liberal Democrats who are uncomfortable with Clinton's close ties to Wall Street and find the prominent role of super PACs in elections utterly distasteful.

But the recent revelation that Clinton will personally fundraise for a super PAC supporting her campaign -- a decision to play by the rules of a system she has condemned as "dysfunctional" -- has invited fresh eye-rolling. It has also exposed a core tension for Democrats, who have increasingly embraced super PACs at the same time that they decry the explosion of soft money in national politics.

Clinton's campaign is explaining the decision as a matter of political necessity.

"With some Republican candidates reportedly setting up and outsourcing their entire campaign to super PACs and the Koch Brothers pledging $1 billion alone for the 2016 campaign, Democrats have to have the resources to fight back," a Clinton campaign official said in an email, who spoke anonymously to discuss the sensitive topic of fundraising. "There is too much at stake for our future for Democrats to unilaterally disarm."

Clinton's expected involvement with Priorities USA has highlighted the contrast between her and Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, an independent who is Clinton's only declared rival to date for the Democratic presidential nomination, as well as other potential challengers.

An independent from Vermont seeking the Democratic presidential nomination, Sanders has aggressively opposed super PAC donations. A long-shot candidate without a national fundraising operation, Sanders has no chance of matching Clinton's fundraising haul and has little to lose by going after millionaire and billionaire donors.

On Capitol Hill last week, Sanders told CNN that Clinton's decision to personally court super PAC donors was "unfortunate."

"We're living in a world since Citizens United where multi-millionaires and billionaires are playing a horrendous role in the political system," Sanders said, referring to the Supreme Court's 2010 ruling that paved the way for super PACs to direct virtually uncapped amounts of money to aid political candidates. "That's why I believe that we need to overturn Citizens United and move to public funding of elections."

A former White House chief of staff for Bill Clinton and a top counselor for President Obama, Podesta has the stature to speak truth to power. His influential role in early structural and strategic decisions suggests that he will be a far more hands-on campaign chairman than most.

Phil Noble, a South Carolina Democratic activist and supporter of former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, a potential Democratic candidate for president, said the development underscores what progressives view as a "fundamental disconnect" between Clinton and middle class voters.

"It's not that she raises a bunch of money for a PAC that causes her problems with middle class voters. That is a symptom as opposed to the ailment," Noble said. "The larger illness is she is out of touch with middle class voters -- she does have a lifestyle and a history that is about as alien to middle class voters as corporate jets are to a Subaru."

And activists who are pushing Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren to challenge Clinton see campaign finance reform as a major issue.

"Being a true champion for working families like Elizabeth Warren is about clearly and unequivocally supporting such critical priorities as a constitutional amendment overturning Citizens United," said Erica Sagrans, campaign manager for Ready for Warren, a movement dedicated to drafting Sen. Elizabeth Warren into the 2016 race.

Clinton's personal involvement with Priorities USA marks the latest chapter in the Democratic Party's evolving relationship with super PACs.

Democrats initially fiercely opposed Citizens United. But for all of their rhetoric against super PACs, and as much as the party continues to use the Supreme Court decision as a political rallying cry, over the years political interest has largely won out over progressive idealism.

In 2012, President Barack Obama reversed course, declaring after years of keeping his distance from super PACs that his campaign would participate in raising money for Priorities USA.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Now that tension is being brought to new heights as the party's next likely presidential nominee personally plans to drum up support for a super PAC backing her candidacy.

Clinton allies also see that her fundraising prowess and the depth of her connections with the kinds of donors who can cut multi-million dollar checks will likely make her a formidable competitor against any Republican candidate she may face in the general election. Officials are careful to emphasize, however, that Clinton and everyone else involved with her campaign will strictly follow the law as they solicit funds for Priorities USA.

The 2016 money race is well underway on the other side of the political aisle.

Declared GOP candidates including Sens. Ted Cruz of Texas and Marco Rubio of Florida, as well as expected candidates like former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, are on a fundraising tear. And they've shown no signs of distancing themselves from super PAC money. Cruz launched his campaign in March, and the senator's allies declared that an affiliated network of pro-Cruz super PACs had raised upwards of $30 million in just a matter of days.

The stiff competition against Republican money is a reality that some progressive leaders say they cannot ignore.

Former Vermont governor and Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean said it would be unwise for Clinton to reject super PAC money.

"Unfortunately, if you don't play by the same rules everybody else does, you end up losing elections," said Dean, founder of Democracy for America, one of the groups behind the draft Warren movement. "The key is to change the rules, and I think we have a much better chance of doing that with her as president than we do with one of the Republicans."

‘Super PACS’ Are Remaking 2016 Campaigns, Official or Not // NYT // Nicholas Confessore and Eric Lichtblau - May 17, 2015

As the 2016 campaign unfolds, Hillary Rodham Clinton will benefit from one rapid-response team working out of a war room in her Brooklyn headquarters — and another one working out of a “super PAC” in Washington.

Jeb Bush has hired a campaign manager, press aides and fund-raisers — yet insists he is not only not running for president, but not even thinking about running for president.

And Senator Marco Rubio’s chance of winning his party’s nomination may hinge on the support of an “independent” group financed by a billionaire who has bankrolled Mr. Rubio’s past campaigns, paid his salary teaching at a university and employed his wife.

With striking speed, the 2016 contenders are exploiting loopholes and regulatory gray areas to transform the way presidential campaigns are organized and paid for.

Their “campaigns” are in practice intricate constellations of political committees, super PACs and tax-exempt groups, engineered to avoid fund-raising restrictions imposed on candidates and their parties after the Watergate scandal.

Major costs of each candidate’s White House bid, from television advertising to opposition research to policy development, are now being shifted to legally independent organizations that can accept unlimited contributions from wealthy individuals, corporations and labor unions.

In this new world, campaigns are not campaigns. And candidates are not actually candidates. Though they sometimes forget it.

“I am running for president in 2016,” Mr. Bush said during a speech in Nevada last week, before quickly amending himself.

“If I run,” clarified Mr. Bush, whose political operation has already raised tens of millions of dollars — just in case.

Much rides on this apparent distinction. Because of it, Mr. Bush and several other contenders have delayed registering their campaigns with the Federal Election Commission, even as they travel the country, meet with voters, attend candidate forums and ask donors for money. That allows them — or so their representatives argue — to personally raise money for and coordinate spending with super PACs.

By law, a campaign and an independent group cannot coordinate their activities. But since there is no campaign, the representatives argue, there is nothing for the groups to illegally coordinate with.

Not everyone agrees. In March, the Campaign Legal Center and Democracy 21, two groups that favor stricter enforcement of campaign regulations, filed complaints with the election commission alleging that Mr. Bush; Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin; Rick Santorum, the former senator from Pennsylvania; and Martin O’Malley, the former Maryland governor, all met the legal definition of being a candidate and were raising tens of millions of dollars in violation of federal rules.

Mr. Bush’s comment in Nevada was “a slip of the mask, not a slip of the tongue,” said Paul S. Ryan, a senior counsel at the Campaign Legal Center. “The rules apply to you as soon as you start spending money to determine whether you will run. Simply denying that you’re a candidate doesn’t get you around these campaign finance laws.”

No potential candidate has been more aggressive in using the new model than Mr. Bush. In recent months, his advisers have created a traditional political action committee — the kind that can accept contributions of only a few thousand dollars per donor — along with a super PAC that can take unlimited contributions and is expected to handle the bulk of the advertising on Mr. Bush’s behalf during the primaries. There is also a nonprofit organization, based in Arkansas, that can raise unlimited contributions and is not required to disclose its donors.

All share some variation of the name “Right to Rise,” and Mr. Bush has headlined fund-raisers for the groups, even putting his name on invitations to more than 300 donors who attended a Right to Rise conference in Miami in April.

Technically, however, the super PAC is controlled by a Republican campaign lawyer in Washington. The regular PAC is run by a Florida accountant who has also prepared Mr. Bush’s taxes. (Mr. Bush is merely the PAC’s “honorary chairman.”) And the nonprofit group is controlled by a former Bush aide who is widely described as the head of Mr. Bush’s policy team, but who has said the nonprofit will merely be “engaged in policy generation that is consistent with Governor Bush’s optimistic, conservative message.”

The non-campaigns reject the idea that their non-candidates are doing anything wrong.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Right to Rise PAC and Honorary Chairman Jeb Bush are fully complying with the law and F.E.C. precedent in all of our activities,” said Tim Miller, who is often described in news accounts as a Bush spokesman but is technically only a consultant to the Right to Rise PAC.

If there is little risk to candidates in pushing the envelope, the benefits are substantial. Outsourcing campaign expenses to a super PAC, for example, allows would-be presidents to avoid the kind of cash-flow problems that can doom their bids even before the first contests in Iowa and New Hampshire.

Traditionally, a candidate who waited too long to hire a campaign staff risked losing all the best talent to rival candidates. Hire too early, and the campaign’s payroll costs quickly balloon, burning through contributions that are capped at $2,700 per donor.

Now candidates set up super PACs and other vehicles before entering the race and fill their bank accounts with six- and seven-figure checks from wealthy supporters. Those groups, in turn, can employ the candidate’s campaign staff-in-waiting.

Mr. Walker’s operation, for example, has hired advisers to handle fund-raising, Christian conservative outreach, polling and more. These advisers are not working for his campaign, which does not yet exist. Instead, all are on the payroll of a tax-exempt organization, Our American Revival, for which Mr. Walker has already raised more than $5 million.

“Governor Walker does not sit on O.A.R.’s board or otherwise control it,” said AshLee Strong, a spokeswoman for the group. “He is simply working with us to advance a big, bold conservative reform agenda across the country.”

The outsourcing even extends to the daily work of “rapid-response,” or reacting to criticisms in the news media or from other candidates.

When a Washington Post fact-checker sought clarification from the Republican campaign of Carly Fiorina about claims she had made about her business career, he was directed to an independent super PAC for some of the answers. The name of the super PAC: Carly for America.

“The super PAC has just been very vocal in defending her, so I thought that they’d be good to talk to,” explained Ms. Fiorina’s spokeswoman, Sarah Isgur Flores. Ms. Flores works for the campaign, which is registered as Carly for President.

Campaign lawyers in both parties say their efforts to circumvent the candidate contribution limits, however suspect they may appear, are fully consistent with existing laws and regulations. And to some extent, the model being pioneered in 2016 is merely a culmination of piecemeal efforts undertaken in past campaigns

Richard L. Hasen, a professor and campaign finance expert at the University of California, Irvine, School of Law, said it had become hard even for him to know what is legal anymore.

“You see some of these things and you have to do a double take; things we thought were established as red lines are no longer red lines,” Mr. Hasen said in an interview. “It’s all a mess.”

That extends to the rules that govern what candidates can do after they formally enter the race. Each cycle brings new tactics for candidates to collaborate with independent groups while trying to steer clear of illegal “coordination.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In 2012, aides to the Republican candidate Mitt Romney were wary of acknowledging that he attended donor gatherings for a super PAC backing his campaign. This time, there is less sensitivity. Mr. Bush, other Republicans and Mrs. Clinton will all be attending donor events organized by super PACs. (Their attendance is legal so long as someone else asks for the money.)

And they are openly courting the donors who will finance the groups: Mr. Rubio frequently speaks with Norman Braman, who has said he and Mr. Rubio are “close personal friends.” Mr. Braman, a billionaire auto dealer who was a major contributor to Mr. Rubio’s past campaigns, helped cover the cost of his teaching job at Florida International University and employed his wife to advise the Braman family’s philanthropic foundation, has pledged at least $10 million to a pro-Rubio super PAC.

Supporters of Mrs. Clinton announced the creation last week of a super PAC, Correct the Record, that would serve as a communications “war room” and coordinate directly with Mrs. Clinton’s campaign.

Federal law prohibits a candidate from controlling super PACs, and such groups cannot coordinate expenditures such as paid advertisements.

But Adrienne Watson, a spokeswoman for the super PAC, said the coordination restriction would not apply because Correct the Record’s defense of Mrs. Clinton would be built around material posted on the group’s own website, not paid media. Ms. Watson also ventured a further distinction that she said would keep Correct the Record on the right side of the law: The group will collaborate with Mrs. Clinton’s campaign, but will not be controlled by it.

“While Correct the Record can legally coordinate with the Clinton campaign, the campaign will not be telling us what to do,” she said.

Bill Clinton to attend Emanuel's, City Council's inaugural ceremony // Chicago Sun Times // Mary Mitchell - May 17, 2015

Former President Bill Clinton will attend the inaugural ceremony Monday at the Chicago Theatre, where Mayor Rahm Emanuel and 50 Chicago aldermen will be sworn in.

Emanuel and Clinton — whose wife, Hillary Clinton, is seeking the Democratic nomination for president — have a long history of working together. In 1982, Emanuel moved to Little Rock, Arkansas, to work for then-Gov. Clinton. Emanuel also served in several senior positions during the Clinton administration.

In an interview ahead of the inauguration, Emanuel talked to Chicago Sun-Times’ City Hall reporter Fran Spielman about issues that confront the city and the dark cloud that hangs over his second term now that the Illinois Supreme Court has overturned state pension reforms and placed city reforms in jeopardy.

“I am energized by the both the opportunities and challenges that I face,” Emanuel said. “They’re daunting, yet they’re incredible.

Bernie Sanders to Introduce Bill to Make College Tuition-Free // Bloomberg // Ali Elkin – May 17, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Democratic presidential hopeful Bernie Sanders will introduce legislation on Tuesday to make public college tuition-free in the United States.

"We live in a highly competitive global economy and, if our economy is to be strong, we need the best-educated work force in the world. That will not happen if, every year, hundreds of thousands of bright young people cannot afford to go to college, and if millions more leave school deeply in debt," the Vermont senator and presidential candidate said in a statement released Sunday.

The plan will provide tuition-free higher education to students at four-year colleges, the statement said, and is modeled after the way many European nations handle the costs of college.

“Countries like Germany, Denmark, Sweden and many more are providing free or inexpensive higher education for their young people.”

Vermont Senator Bernie Sanders

"Countries like Germany, Denmark, Sweden and many more are providing free or inexpensive higher education for their young people," Sanders said in the statement. "They understand how important it is to be investing in their youth. We should be doing the same."

The move could put added pressure on Democratic front-runner Hillary Clinton, who has yet to release her plan for higher education. A few weeks ago, campaign manager Robby Mook used the phrase "debt-free college," when discussing the issues important to young people, but Clinton has not yet said whether or not that would be a part of her plan. Sanders's move could stack this issue on top of the Trans-Pacific Partnership trade deal as another issue awaiting comment from Clinton, in which more liberal Democrats are herding her to the left.

President Obama continues to try and drum up congressional support for his plan to make community college tuition-free.

“I want to lower the cost of community college to zero," Obama said earlier this month at Lake Area Technical Institute in Watertown, South Dakota. "We can’t afford to let striving Americans be priced out of the education they need to get ahead.”

Sanders's statement said his bill will also seek to "substantially lower student debt and bring down interest rates on college loans."

Iowa GOP audience delights in bounty of choices // Des Moines Register // Jennifer Jacobs - May 17, 2015

Republicans exulted in what they see as a smorgasbord of good choices in their 2016 presidential lineup, but former CEO Carly Fiorina seemed to steal the show at the Iowa GOP's Lincoln Dinner on Saturday night.

The audience of 1,400 stopped just short of booing when dinner organizers cut the sound to her microphone when she reached the strict 10-minute speaking limit set for all 11 presidential hopefuls.

One of Fiorina's best-received lines: "I was asked whether a woman's hormones prevent her from serving in the Oval Office. OK, ladies, this is a test: Can you think of a single instance in which a man's judgment was clouded by his hormones? Including in the Oval Office?"

"She was like a fireball," said one dinner guest, Tanya Manatt, a 43-year-old Johnston resident who owns a bridal boutique. "She had a lot of energy, and she's not intimidated."

The night's next most popular hopefuls — based on crowd reaction, a sampling of interviews with dinner guests and observations of the traffic in each contender's hospitality room after the speeches — were three governors: former Texas Gov. Rick Perry, former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush and Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker.

"As far as covering the bases and making me feel like he would be a good leader, Jeb Bush was next best," Manatt said. "I did not expect that. I didn't want to like him."

A big honorable mention, for humor and a touching personal story about the deaths of both of his parents when he was a young man, seemed to go to South Carolina U.S. Sen. Lindsey Graham.

Graham offered a steady stream of quips as soon as he took the stage.

"Chuck Grassley. Is he still here? The one thing I've learned about this dinner: It was free for Chuck or he wouldn't have been here."

But there were some gasps when Graham, in a serious moment, said: "If you're thinking about joining al-Qaeda or ISIS, I'm not going to call a judge, I'm going to call a drone, and we will kill you. We're at war, and I'm tired of treating the war as a crime."

The 11 who auditioned for the role of presidential nominee during the dinner at the Iowa Events Center were Fiorina, Perry, Bush, Walker, Graham, retired doctor Ben Carson, Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal, former New York Gov. George Pataki, Kentucky U.S. Sen. Rand Paul, former Pennsylvania U.S. Sen. Rick Santorum and New York reality TV star Donald Trump.

Several audience members said they thought Perry and Bush overperformed, while Walker underperformed, but still did a good job pitching his status as an adopted Iowan of sorts and hitting hard on national security and "safety."

"Rick Perry had a lot of energy, no notes and definite ideas about what he wanted to do and the experience to back it up as a former military man. I liked him so much more than I did four years ago," said Shelley Pitts of Cumming, who works at Von Maur. "And Carly. I loved her. I just loved everything she said."

In his speech, Perry knocked common core education standards, proposed rebuilding the U.S. military and bemoaned an "underlying pessimism we see in this country" about the future.

"If we will unleash people from over-taxation, over-regulation, over-litigation ... we will have the greatest days in America ahead," Perry said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Although several audience members said Bush seemed a little nervous — he stumbled on some words and referred to his notes more than others did — they praised how he explained his conservative record in Florida and the passion he exhibited on education issues.

"To me, Bush exceeded expectations," said Bill Schickel, a former Iowa GOP official. Schickel also listed Perry, Graham and Fiorina as favorites.

Bush said whether people like it or not, he's proud of the fact that he's "George and Barbara's boy" and that "W's my brother." Bush talked about his successes as Florida governor in job creation, school choice and protecting "the most vulnerable in society," including the unborn, the disabled and the frail.

Walker showed a photo of himself at age 7 that was shot, he said, after he and his brother went door to door raising money for a state flag at the Plainfield City Hall. His family lived there in the mid-1970s. Walker was one of the only ones to insert religion into his speech, talking about his recent trip to Israel and how he was moved to see the spot where "literally Christ fed the 5,000."

Paul zoned in on civil liberties issues, arguing that Americans don't have to "give up what our founding fathers fought for in order to catch terrorists."

Carson called division, the economy and a failure to lead the world the three biggest problems facing America.

Jindal said two major threats the country faces are Islamic terrorism abroad and the trampling of religious liberties at home. A third threat: the polices of President Barack Obama and former U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, he said.

Santorum said Republicans need to remember the 74 percent of Americans who lack a college degree, many of whom still struggle economically.

Pataki noted that he was governor when the airplanes hit the World Trade Center towers on Sept. 11, 2001. But today, "the greatest threat to our freedom," he said, is an ever-encroaching government. "It's not an imminent threat, but it's a very real threat," he said.

Trump, a real estate mogul turned reality TV star, said he can build a wall on the U.S. southern border ("I'm a good builder") and has already created tens of thousands of jobs. Trump expressed indignation that people — namely the news media — don't believe he'll run. He said he'll make an announcement in June that's "going to surprise a lot of people."

Not everyone in the crowd could take Trump seriously.

"Trump! I was trying to hold it in. I didn't want to laugh too much," said the Rev. Lawrence Davis, a 63-year-old Des Moines pastor. "Now, Carly, she was dynamite. She knew what she was talking about."

The hospitality rooms weren't all the same size so it was hard to judge, but a nonscientific survey throughout the night showed Walker's room, in a prime spot at the bottom of the escalators leading from the banquet hall, was the most packed at first.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Cold beer!" said a sign out front. Wisconsin cheese and Miller beer were being served inside.

Long lines waited for snapshots with Fiorina, Carson and Trump, the night's celebrities.

But near the end of the evening, the biggest crowds had migrated to Bush's room, which was unadorned by decorations, but had an open bar and a buffet of hors d'oeuvres.

Paul and Pataki didn't host receptions. All the other contenders drew decent-sized crowds, except Santorum.

His Iowa chairman, state Rep. Walt Rogers, R-Cedar Falls, said the small crowds showed that "people know Rick well. Everyone's kicking the tires on everyone else. But they'll come back to an old, solid four wheels like Rick."

Republican Candidates Dodge Immigration Questions // TIME // Alex Altman - May 17, 2015

Sitting in a hotel conference room of a Scottsdale, Ariz., resort, Mike Huckabee kibitzed with a few reporters Friday about issues ranging from the Iraq War to the suspension of New England Patriots quarterback Tom Brady.

But when the talk turned to whether undocumented immigrants should have a path to U.S. citizenship, the former Arkansas governor clammed up. “Until we have a secure border,” Huckabee demurred, “there isn’t any other discussion for us to be having.”

Huckabee isn’t the only Republican presidential candidate to dodge the topic lately. As the 2016 race ramps up, GOP candidates are increasingly skirting the specifics of immigration policy. It’s a trend that threatens the party’s hopes of reclaiming the White House.

Routed in the battle for Hispanic voters in 2012, the Republican Party promised to speak differently about immigration this time. But the need to repair its relationship with Latinos has collided with its candidates’ need to court the conservative activists who dominate the GOP nominating contest. As a result, many of the party’s presidential hopefuls don’t want to divulge the details of their positions on an issue with major political and policy ramifications.

To discern the differences between the candidates on immigration, TIME distributed a brief survey to declared and likely White House hopefuls. The questions focused on the fate of the estimated 11 million undocumented immigrants currently in the U.S., a subject at the heart of the bipartisan debate over comprehensive immigration reform:

1. Do you support an eventual pathway to citizenship for undocumented immigrants currently residing in the U.S., and if so, under what conditions?

2. Do you support an eventual pathway to legal status short of citizenship for undocumented immigrants currently residing in the U.S., and if so, under what conditions?

3. Do you support a separate process to give legal status or citizenship to undocumented immigrants who were brought to the U.S. as minors?

4. Do you support any government benefits, such as in-state college tuition, for undocumented immigrants who were brought to the U.S. as minors?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

5. Some likely GOP candidates offered clear and succinct answers. Former Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum was a “no” on all four, according to his spokesman. South Carolina Sen. Lindsey Graham, one of the architects of the Senate’s bipartisan attempt to overhaul U.S. immigration laws in 2013, stuck by his support for a path to citizenship under detailed conditions. “Citizenship need not be mandatory, but it needs to be an option for those who are qualified,” said Graham spokeswoman Brittany Bramell. Graham also backed a process to give legal status or citizenship—along with government benefits like in-state tuition—to minors brought to the U.S. by their parents.

But the majority of the field offered muddier responses, or declined to answer at all. Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal was one of several to argue the debate should be postponed until the southern border is secured.

“Any discussion about dealing with who is already here is counterproductive until the border is secure,” Jindal told TIME in a statement issued through his spokesman. “Any attempt to deal with the millions of people who are currently in this country illegally prior to securing the border is illogical, and is nothing more than amnesty.”

Asked about a pathway to legal status for undocumented workers who met certain conditions, Jindal dismissed it as “a hypothetical conversation.” As for legal status or citizenship for those brought to the U.S. as minors, Jindal turned the focus to Obama. “A serious discussion about those individuals is just not possible right now because of the reckless policies of this administration,” he said. “This President has done everything he can to encourage illegal immigration.”

GOP hopefuls debate: Was Iraq a mistake? // LA Times // Katherine Skiba - May 17, 2015

Leading candidates for the Republican presidential nomination split sharply Sunday on the same question that tripped up Jeb Bush last week: Was invading Iraq a mistake?

No, said Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.): The 2003 invasion was the right decision because President George W. Bush had intelligence findings indicating that Iraq had weapons of mass destruction.

Bush “wasn’t dealing with a Nobel Prize winner. He was dealing with Saddam Hussein,” Rubio said. “And he made the right decision based on the information he had at that time.”

At the other end of the GOP spectrum, Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul stopped just short of saying that the U.S. would have done better to leave Hussein in power. He questioned whether toppling secular dictators in the Mideast had helped or hurt U.S. interests.

“I think when Hussein was toppled, we got chaos,” Paul said. “We still have chaos in Iraq. I think it emboldened Iran,” he added. “We now have the rise of radical Islam in Iraq as well.”

A third potential candidate, Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, took a position closer to Rubio than Paul.

“I think any president, regardless of party, probably would have made a similar decision to what President Bush did at the time with the information that he had available,” Walker said.

“Knowing what we know now, I think it’s safe for many of us, myself included, to say we probably wouldn’t have taken that tack” to launch an invasion, he said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Jeb Bush, the former Florida governor, spent much of last week revising answers to the question of whether he agreed with his older brother's decision in 2003 to invade Iraq. After first saying yes, then calling the question hypothetical, he eventually settled on this answer:

"If we're all supposed to answer hypothetical questions knowing what we know now, what would you have done, I would have not engaged, I would not have gone into Iraq."

Bush's shifting responses drew dismayed comments from Republican activists who said he seemed unprepared for an obvious question.

While most of the potential candidates have focused on what they characterize as an "intelligence failure" in the prewar assessments of Iraq's weapons program, Paul's question about whether overthrowing dictators is a good idea involves a deeper disagreement with longtime GOP foreign policy.

He has raised similar questions about U.S. policy toward Syria, where the Obama administration is, at least officially, committed to seeing President Bashar Assad removed from power.

Paul has several times made the point that although Assad is a dictator, he has fought against Islamic radicals and defended the interests of Syrian Christians.

Rubio, by contrast, has joined many other Republicans in chastising the administration for not doing more to overthrow Assad. On Sunday, he repeated his call for the U.S. to take a more muscular approach, saying the administration should find a group "on the ground in Syria that we could work with."

Rubio made his remarks on "Fox News Sunday"; Paul was interviewed on NBC's "Meet the Press"; Walker was interviewed on CBS' "Face the Nation."

The three also differed in how they analyzed negotiations with Iran over its nuclear program.

Paul, asked if he would consider using military force against a country trying to develop a nuclear weapons program, said the U.S. always should have the threat of military force behind diplomacy.

"But I would prefer diplomacy. I think we can still have negotiations," he said. "We negotiated with the Soviets for 70 years, and we ended up coming to a peaceful outcome."

"My hope is really that negotiations continue," he said. "There are some in my party who say, 'Oh, I don't want any negotiations.' They're ready to be done with it," he added. "But once you're done with negotiations, the choices are war, or they get a weapon, and I don't wanna have just those two binary choices."

Rubio disagreed. The outlines of negotiations to contain Iran's nuclear programs are "much worse than anybody anticipated," he said. "And, in fact, every time there's a new revelation about the deal, it gets worse and worse and worse."

Walker said that any agreement with Iran must include full dismantling of what he characterized as its "illicit" nuclear infrastructure, which he said was a "real threat" to Israel as well as the U.S. allies among the Arab states of the Persian Gulf.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The deal the administration has been negotiating with Iran would put new limits on what Iran can do with its nuclear facilities and would impose new inspections on them, but would not dismantle them.

Not surprisingly, the one area on which all three would-be nominees agreed was in criticizing former Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton, the likely Democratic candidate.

“If she ever takes questions,” reporters should ask Clinton, “Was it a good idea to invade Libya?” during Obama’s first term, Paul said. “Did that make us less safe? Did it make it more chaotic? Did it allow radical Islam and ISIS to grow stronger?”

“I think the war in Iraq is a good question,” he said, “but so is the question of ‘Should we have gone into Libya?’ ”

Rubio criticized Clinton for her position on Iraq during the latter part of the Bush presidency. “We don’t know how she justifies, for example, not supporting the surge in Iraq and these sorts of other things,” he said. Clinton, who was a senator from New York at the time, opposed the 2007 surge.

Paul, asked about surveillance provision of the Patriot Act, which is scheduled to expire at the end of this month, noted that a federal appeals court in New York earlier this month had ruled that the government’s collection of records of U.S. telephone calls was illegal. So “really, it oughta stop.”

“You can catch terrorists,” he said. “Judges will grant warrants” when investigators have a specific person they want to pursue, he said.

The Senate is to take up the Patriot Act this week. Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell has called for an extension of the surveillance provisions through the end of July to give Congress more time to work on replacement legislation. Paul did not say whether he would attempt to block such an extension by a filibuster.

Lindsey Graham to provide ‘very important update’ on 2016 plans Monday // WaPo // Sean Sullivan - May 17, 2015

Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.), who in recent months has moved closer to running for president, will provide a "very important update" on his plans Monday morning, he told supporters on Sunday.

"Tomorrow morning I will be giving a very important update on my 2016 plans and I want to make sure you are able to hear it," Graham wrote in an e-mail to his supporters.

He said he will appear on CBS's "This Morning" at 8 a.m. Eastern time.

"As an announcement draws near, I need to know you stand with me," Graham continued, linking to a page where people can donate money to his exploratory committee.

Graham formed the committee, Security Through Strength, in January and has been staffing it as he prepares for what looks increasingly like it will become a full-fledged run for president. A Graham spokesperson did not immediately respond to a question about his plans.

Politico reported earlier this month that Graham told donors that June 1 was the likely date for his presidential announcement.

If Graham runs, he is likely to center his campaign around the theme of national security. He is among the most hawkish figures in the Republican Party and already has secured the support of Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), a close friend and fellow hawk.

Top Scott Walker aides pushed for questionable $500,000 WEDC loan // Wisconsin State Journal // Matthew DeFour - May 17, 2015

Gov. Scott Walker's top aides and a powerful lobbyist pressed for a taxpayer-funded loan in 2011 to a financially struggling Milwaukee construction company that lost the state half a million dollars, created no jobs and raised questions about where the money went, a State Journal investigation has found.

The extraordinary steps led the Wisconsin Economic Development Corp. in 2011 to award a $500,000 unsecured loan to Building Committee Inc., owned by William Minahan, for a proposed project to retrofit bank and credit union buildings for energy efficiency.

The loan, which was not repaid, is one of several agency awards that state auditors have questioned since Walker created the agency in 2011. Last year, WEDC, the state's flagship job-creation agency, took the unusual step of suing BCI in an attempt to get the money back.

The failed deal was made at the urging of then-Administration Secretary Mike Huebsch, who wanted WEDC to provide a forgivable loan to the company eight times that size, according to Paul Jadin, former CEO of WEDC.

Walker's office confirmed that Huebsch introduced the company's owner to Jadin. Lobbyist Eric Petersen, who represented BCI and Minahan, and Keith Gilkes, Walker's former campaign manager who was the governor's chief of staff at the time, met in June 2011 with Huebsch and Minahan to discuss the loan, according to records obtained by the State Journal under the state's open records law.

Hours after his office released those and other records to the State Journal on Friday, Walker, who is considering a 2016 presidential bid, called on the Legislature to scrap WEDC's entire loan program, citing a recent legislative audit.

The push to fund the BCI project came after Minahan gave Walker's 2010 Republican campaign for governor a last-minute infusion of $10,000 on Election Day — the maximum individual contribution.

Jadin said Minahan and Huebsch -- a member of the WEDC board by virtue of his role as Administration secretary -- pushed for a $4.3 million WEDC loan, but the agency could justify no more than a $500,000 loan, which Jadin said he considered "fairly risky."

"I wanted to assist the company to the extent that they qualified given that it had such a strong endorsement from Secretary Huebsch," Jadin said.

The State Journal investigation found that Huebsch, a former Assembly speaker from West Salem, was advocating for the taxpayer loan to BCI as the now-defunct company was collapsing.

The State Journal also found that:

· WEDC awarded the unsecured loan to BCI only after Huebsch and other DOA officials were unable to find funding from state or federal energy programs or the utility-funded Focus on Energy program, according to a May 2011 memo.

· WEDC was unable to locate the original underwriting documents justifying the $500,000 loan to BCI. Huebsch's agency had offered to conduct a "staff review" of the proposed loan for WEDC, but state officials said that review never happened.

· On his 2011 WEDC loan application, Minahan checked "no" when asked if BCI or any of its officers had been sued in the previous five years, although electronic court records show three such lawsuits.

· After Jadin left the agency, WEDC approved BCI's request for more time to repay the loan and helped it seek federally subsidized energy bonding even as other creditors filed lawsuits against BCI and Minahan seeking half a million dollars for unpaid bills.

· Minahan listed La Crosse-based Michaels Energy and UW-Milwaukee as partners in the proposed project. But the owner of Michaels Energy and the dean of the UW-Milwaukee School of Architecture and Urban Design said their organizations never received any proceeds from the state loan and did little or no work on the project.

· Minahan sent two short emails in response to a set of detailed questions posed by the State Journal. He chalked up the failure of the loan to the recession's impact on the construction industry.

"Having worked in the construction industry since 1982, Wisconsin-based BCI was fortunate to serve the planning, design and construction management needs of hundreds of clients across the country," Minahan wrote. "WEDC's initial financial support of our efforts demonstrates their shared vision to find efficiencies and to reduce energy costs for existing private sector and municipally owned buildings in Wisconsin."

Huebsch, who has since been appointed by the governor to a $129,000-a-year job at the Public Service Commission, released a statement through DOA spokesman Cullen Werwie. In it, he acknowledges working to find funding for Minahan's project through his former agency and WEDC.

"As the Secretary of DOA, I often worked to connect small businesses with resources that could lead to job creation," Huebsch's statement said. "After the initial connection, there was some additional follow-up on my part with WEDC to ask that it be clearly communicated to BCI what additional resources, if any, may be available, as well as to ask that the denial of additional loan funds be communicated directly to BCI."

Walker spokeswoman Laurel Patrick said Walker was not aware of Minahan's donation to his gubernatorial campaign. According to the Wisconsin Democracy Campaign, Minahan was one of 32 people who made the maximum $10,000 individual donation to Friends of Scott Walker in 2010.

Petersen said he was not involved in Minahan's donation but represented clients who did give to Walker's campaign.

Patrick also said Friday the governor, who chairs the WEDC board, "has not met with Mr. Minahan, nor was he involved in or aware of any part of the loan process concerning The Building Committee Inc."

She added that "there was no further contact or involvement with our office beyond the initial meeting" involving Gilkes.

In calling Friday for an end to the loan program, Walker did not mention the BCI loan. Instead he cited a recent Legislative Audit Bureau report that found the agency did not always follow its internal policies, including verifying the number of jobs created by aid recipients.

The audit also found that while WEDC had reduced its outstanding loans from $4.2 million to $1.3 million in 2014, most of the decline was due to loans being extended, forgiven or written off.

The $500,000 BCI award was one of 10 loans the agency wrote off last year.

Huebsch pushes funding

Minahan met with Walker administration officials to discuss the loan proposal in June 2011 as Walker was launching WEDC, a public-private organization designed to be more nimble and competent than its predecessor, the Department of Commerce. Walker had promised to help create 250,000 jobs during his first term, and forming the agency was a key vehicle to achieving that goal. In the end, Walker fell short by 100,000 jobs.

Jadin, WEDC's first chief executive, said Minahan and Huebsch initially sought a $4.3 million forgivable loan for BCI, which specialized in building bank and credit union buildings. The company said its project to retrofit financial buildings for energy efficiency would generate 155 jobs in Wisconsin.

It was the only time Huebsch pushed for a specific deal, Jadin said, adding he first learned of the proposal from Huebsch.

"I don't recall another situation where the secretary became an advocate," he said.

Jadin said he told Huebsch he would have the agency's underwriters check BCI's financial viability and come back with a recommendation.

On Sept. 3, 2011, Chris Schoenherr, then-head of DOA's energy division, sent a WEDC official information about the project, saying "we are on a tight time frame on the first stage of this."

Weeks later, Jadin signed a $500,000, one-year, unsecured loan. WEDC spokesman Mark Maley said the agency is unable to locate the underwriting documents supporting the loan.

Jadin said Minahan and Huebsch continued to press the case for additional funding after the initial award. Emails show Minahan had multiple contacts with WEDC in late 2011 and early 2012. The agency and Minahan corresponded about terms for additional money.

In one case, WEDC offered BCI another $500,000 if Minahan agreed to provide a personal guarantee of $1 million, which he rejected in February 2012. A few months later, a WEDC underwriter recommended against another proposal, for a $1.5 million loan, noting "the value of the business owned is hard to determine without any supporting financial documentation."

"At this point in time," the underwriter wrote, "there does not appear to be a clear source of repayment for the ($500,000) loan. In addition, there does not appear to be adequate collateral to secure additional WEDC funding."

After the loan was granted, Jadin said he met with Minahan and Huebsch to discuss additional financing.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He said the BCI owner was unable to answer questions about how retrofitting banks and credit unions for energy efficiency would generate jobs aside from “normal construction on normal construction projects.”

“We concluded it was already a fairly risky loan and decided not to provide any additional funding,” Jadin said. “I had very significant concerns about (Minahan’s) ability to deliver on the basic business premise. I believe my position was clear and unambiguous, and Secretary Huebsch understood there were no more funds forthcoming, and he dropped it.”

A state audit later noted the underwriters had warned the original deal did not include any collateral from its owner, meaning the state would not be able to seize property — such as Minahan’s $975,000 home in River Hills — in the case of a default. Jadin said he did not recall that aspect of the loan.

Jadin, a Republican and former mayor of Green Bay, left WEDC on Nov. 1, 2012, a month after the loan was due, to head up MadREP, an economic development group in Madison.

WEDC extends loan

As 2012 came to a close, a BCI representative told WEDC it had run out of money for the project, agency records show. WEDC’s management team, excluding CEO Reed Hall, authorized extending the loan due date to Aug. 1, 2013, Maley said.

In the seven months after the new loan due date, WEDC sent BCI six notices warning the loan was overdue and then in default. Even as it was sending those notices, WEDC and Huebsch’s Department of Administration continued to help BCI in its ultimately unsuccessful effort to secure $4.5 million in federal energy conservation bond funding.

Last July, WEDC sued the company seeking repayment of the loan. On Nov. 4 — the day Walker was elected to his second term as governor — a Dane County Circuit Court judge ordered BCI to repay the loan plus interest totaling $542,000. BCI has not repaid the loan.

Hall, Jadin’s successor, declined to be interviewed.

“Throughout this process, WEDC diligently monitored and tracked this loan,” Maley said. “When it became clear BCI was unable to secure funding to repay the loan, WEDC aggressively pursued repayment through past-due and default notices, and eventually by taking the company to court to secure a judgment against BCI.”

The $500,000 loan may have been even riskier than WEDC officials knew.

The loan application asked whether the applicant or any owner or officer had been sued in the previous five years, warning that the applicant “will be deemed ineligible and denied based on the falsification of information.” Minahan checked “no” to that question.

But electronic court records show at least three lawsuits against the company in 2010, including one in which BCI was ordered to pay $14,364 to Superior Safe & Security of Green Bay. The second was a $15,800 tax warrant from the state of Wisconsin that Minahan paid. The third was filed by an Oshkosh custom millwork company but was dismissed.

It’s also unclear what work BCI performed on the taxpayer-funded energy project.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A 2012 report to WEDC from Minahan purported to detail how the funding was used, but it did not list who did what work nor how much they were paid. The three buildings it said were readied for retrofit were not identified, nor were the seven buildings that the report said had preliminary planning work done on them.

Officials with La Crosse-based Michaels Energy and UW-Milwaukee also questioned BCI's characterization of them in the report as partners in the project.

Michaels Energy's owner David Waffenschmidt told the State Journal that he spoke with Minahan and BCI chief operating officer David Jaeckels in 2009 about a possible retrofit project and did some preliminary work on it but assumed the proposal had been dropped.

"We were not aware of, and not party to, the contract between Building Committee Inc. and WEDC, nor did we receive any payment from Building Committee Inc. or anyone else for our work on these development efforts," Waffenschmidt said. "We talked about doing this, but that's all the farther it went."

Robert Greenstreet, dean of the UW-Milwaukee architectural school, said he discussed the energy retrofit project with Minahan and Jaeckels and helped submit applications for federal funding. But Greenstreet said it was his perception that BCI "collapsed," no federal money was secured, and he assumed the project never got off the ground. Greenstreet recalled Minahan saying BCI had lined up state funding, but there was a delay in getting the money.

"The long and short of it is, we have not done any work on this project at all," he said.

Scott Walker's Iowa dilemma // Politico // James Hohmann, Katie Glueck, and Eli Stokols -May 17, 2015

There's a game of chicken going on in Iowa right now.

When Jeb Bush revealed this week that he will blow off the state GOP's famed August straw poll, he left the future of the event to Scott Walker. Since all of the top tier presidential prospects are waiting to see who will compete before they commit to the straw poll this year, if the Wisconsin governor — and current Iowa front-runner — declines to participate, there's a good chance Marco Rubio, Rand Paul and other candidates will follow suit.

The result is that the event, an Iowa tradition dating back to 1979, could become a mostly irrelevant contest between longshots and underdogs.

Walker, who's publicly non-committal, leads in recent Iowa polls, may have the toughest decision of all — he's damned if he plays and damned if he doesn't. If he participates and loses, he risks looking like a fading candidate who peaked too soon. But if he plays it safe and skips the straw poll, he could badly alienate Iowa Republicans — more likely than not ending his status as the state's perceived front-runner. At the same time, if Walker and every other top candidate skipped it, the damage to the 47-year-old governor would be minimal.

The importance of the straw poll to the state GOP was highlighted Saturday night when, with 11 candidates present to speak at the Iowa Republican Party Lincoln Dinner, Iowa GOP Chairman Jeff Kauffman opened Saturday's confab with a video emphasizing the poll's relevance. He was followed by Sen. Chuck Grassley, the leading Republican in the state, who stressed the seriousness of the tradition.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Two-thirds of Iowa Republican insiders think Walker should compete in the straw poll, according to this week's edition of The POLITICO Caucus, a weekly pulse-taking of the most important activists, operatives and elected officials in the early states.

"Participate and you are expected to win, and must win," said a top Iowa Republican, who is uncommitted and — like all 77 respondents – completed the weekly questionnaire anonymously in order to answer candidly. "Skip, and everyone thinks you're a coward. Then watch your standing in the Iowa polls continue to drop. Walker needs to suck it up and use the event to cement himself as the frontrunner in the race."

There is immense pressure from grassroots activists, who love the event and see shying away from it as proof of weakness or aloofness. "To be a frontrunner in Iowa with this standing, Walker needs to demonstrate that he can compete and win in a straw poll," said another Republican.

But just as many GOP insiders said the Wisconsin governor would be foolish to fall into that trap. "Walker will underperform, if he goes," said one. "He should avoid Tim Pawlenty's outcome." Another added, "No upside. Only downside to this event."

Texas Sen. Ted Cruz and retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson have already telegraphed that that they will play to win.

While Ron Paul's campaign was obsessed with straw polls the previous two presidential elections — the then-Texas congressman finished second at Ames in 2011 — his son, Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul, isn't as committed. He's more focused on winning actual elections and has told aides that he's not as interested as his father in artificial tests of his strength.

A spokesman for the younger Paul said he hasn't decided whether to come or not.

Representatives for former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee — who won the 2008 Iowa caucuses — and former Hewlett Packard head Carly Fiorina were also non-committal. For Huckabee and Rick Santorum, the 2012 caucus winner, participating is risky because it could highlight how many of their former supporters are not signed on for 2016.

To feel good about his chances, Walker would probably have to spend hundreds of thousands of dollars. Campaigns need to bus in supporters from around the state on a summer Saturday, no small feat. But expectations would be almost unachievably high since he's been leading the pack in polling since January. Even if he won the straw poll handily, Walker's opponents will dismiss the victory as unsurprising.

All of that makes Walker's straw poll decision arguably the most significant strategic decision he will make about Iowa in 2015.

The straw poll needs Walker more than he needs it. If all the top-tier candidates bypass the event, it will not get nearly as much media attention as in the past.

"If Walker backs out, the Iowa straw poll is in big trouble," said a top uncommitted Iowa Republican.

The state Republican Party has been using carrots and sticks to coax Walker and others to play at the event, which is moving from Ames to Boone this year. Instead of auctioning off space to raise money from the campaigns, for instance, they're assigning it to them – whether they will use it or not. There will also be food trucks, so that the campaigns do not need to cater the event themselves if they don't want to. This will make it glaringly obvious who is not there and take away one of the main rationales – at least publicly – for skipping.

"Neither Walker nor Rubio can afford to do the Straw Poll without the other," said an uncommitted Iowa

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Republican. “So, who blinks first in bowing out? Assuming they both decline, an Iowa Straw Poll without Walker, Rubio and Bush, might as well be renamed the Iowa 2nd Tier Candidate Straw Poll. Upside in that? It might make the event go away once and for all.”

Sources close to Walker’s campaign-in-waiting insist that he has not made up his mind. Because he will not announce his candidacy until after the Wisconsin legislative session wraps up later this spring, he has at least a few more weeks to avoid taking a public position. “He’s not a candidate and hasn’t made a decision on his future, so this will come down the line,” said one Walker aide.

But the event is only three months away, and the clock is ticking.

Walker has hired consultants, such as David Polyansky and Eric Woolson, who have extensive experience organizing the kind of field operation needed to win past straw polls. “Scott Walker is the Iowa frontrunner and has hired several key Iowa advisers who know how to put on a successful straw poll operation,” said an Iowa Republican aligned with a rival campaign. “If he doesn’t play, he is ceding his frontrunner status to someone who takes Iowa more seriously and it will be very difficult to get it back.”

Walker allies say that the pressure should be on Rubio as much as it is them. The Florida senator has not been as aggressive at trying to downplay expectations. On his last trip to the state, he said he will play to win. The same day, Walker said he would be happy finishing in the top three.

A Rubio spokesman did not respond to three requests for comment this week on whether the senator will compete.

Bush’s decision to skip the straw poll didn’t come as a surprise. He did not seriously consider it, sources familiar with his thinking said — despite the fact his brother won in 2000 and his father won the inaugural straw poll in 1979. That doesn’t mean Bush won’t compete in Iowa; after a four month absence, he had three events scheduled in the state this weekend. Bush, an establishment favorite, trailed six other Republican presidential hopefuls in Quinnipiac’s Iowa poll earlier this month.

“It’s a predictable decision for Jeb Bush and the right decision,” said John Weaver, who served as an adviser to John McCain’s 2008 campaign and along with Mike Murphy, now one of Bush’s main strategists, convinced the Arizona senator (and eventual GOP nominee) to skip the 2007 straw poll. Romney won that straw poll, but Mike Huckabee got the bounce in the polls afterward by finishing a surprisingly strong second. In 2011, Romney skipped the straw poll and wound up basically tying for first on caucus night.

“After Michele Bachmann [who won the event in 2011], to say this has any relevance, significance, influence, doesn’t pass the straight face test,” said Steve Schmidt, McCain’s 2008 campaign manager. “The straw poll simply wasn’t worth the time and the money in the context of how little meaning it had in relation to the outcome of the caucuses.”

Bush, along with Walker, Rick Perry, Carly Fiorina and others, has committed to attend a conservative cattle call in Atlanta hosted by RedState founder Erick Erickson that is concurrent to the straw poll. South Carolina Sen. Lindsey Graham has also already ruled out attendance.

The Iowa GOP’s Kaufmann took aim directly at Bush on Twitter Tuesday as reports of his decision to appear in Atlanta on Aug. 8, the day of the straw poll, surfaced.

“We hope Governor Bush rethinks his decision and realizes that grassroots will only grow in Iowa if he waters them,” the state party chair tweeted. “The RedState Gathering is a four-day event and other candidates have already indicated that they will be attending both. We don’t buy this excuse and neither will Iowans.”

Jeb Bush Takes Tougher Stance Against Same-Sex Marriage // First Draft – NYT // Patrick Healy – May 17, 2015

Former Gov. Jeb Bush of Florida hardened his position against same-sex marriage in an interview that aired on Sunday, making clear he did not believe in constitutional protection for gay marriages — an issue now before the United States Supreme Court — and leaving out his past call for "respect" for gay couples.

Appearing on "The Brody File" on the Christian Broadcasting Network, Mr. Bush, a likely Republican candidate for president in 2016, was asked in a brief interview if he believed there should be a constitutional right to same-sex marriage.

"I don't, but I'm not a lawyer, and clearly this has been accelerated at a warp pace," he said. "What's interesting is four years ago, Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton had the same view that I just expressed to you." He added: "Thousands of years of culture and history is just being changed at warp speed. It's hard to fathom why it is this way."

He also warned that the country's future would be at risk without traditional marriages between a man and a woman who go on to raise children.

"To imagine how we are going to succeed in our country unless we have committed family life, committed child-centered family system, is hard to imagine," Mr. Bush said. "We need to be stalwart supporters of traditional marriage."

Mr. Bush was explicitly opposed to same-sex marriage for years, but in recent months, since he has been considering a run for the presidency, he has made a wider range of statements — saying same-sex marriage is an issue that should be decided by the states, for instance. This winter, as gay couples began to wed in Florida, Mr. Bush also struck a conciliatory tone about those marriages.

"We live in a democracy, and regardless of our disagreements, we have to respect the rule of law," he said in a statement to The New York Times in January. "I hope that we can show respect for the good people on all sides of the gay and lesbian marriage issue — including couples making lifetime commitments to each other who are seeking greater legal protections and those of us who believe marriage is a sacrament and want to safeguard religious liberty."

Mr. Bush reiterated in the "Brody File" interview on Sunday that his views about same-sex marriage are based on his Catholic faith. "I think traditional marriage is a sacrament," he said. "It's at the core of the Catholic faith."

Jeb Bush: No constitutional right to same-sex marriage // WaPo // Ed O'Keefe - May 17, 2015

Former Florida governor Jeb Bush reiterated in a new interview that he doesn't believe that same-sex marriage is a constitutional right.

The high court is expected to rule next month on the constitutionality of same-sex marriage, and court observers and justices have hinted in recent weeks that the court is likely to expand marriage rights to gay men and lesbians.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Speaking with "The Brody File" on the Christian Broadcasting Network, Bush described marriage between a man and a woman as "a sacrament," one of the seven significant ceremonies of the Catholic faith.

"It's at the core of the Catholic faith, and to imagine how we are going to succeed in our country unless we have committed family life, a committed child-centered family system, is hard to imagine," he said. "So, irrespective of the Supreme Court ruling — because they are going to decide whatever they decide, I don't know what they are going to do — we need to be stalwart supporters of traditional marriage."

He told CBN's David Brody that he doesn't believe same-sex marriage is a constitutional right, "but I'm not a lawyer and clearly this has been accelerated at a warp pace. What's interesting is four years ago Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton had the same view that I just expressed to you. It's thousands of years of culture and history just being changed at warp speed. It's hard to fathom why it is this way."

Bush isn't the only Republican presidential hopeful who has raised concerns about how quickly courts have been ruling in favor of same-sex marriage rights. Sen. Marco Rubio (Fla.) also has noted in speeches and interviews that traditional marriage is an institution that is centuries old, much older than the United States itself.

"The Brody File" remains a must-do for GOP candidates, given that the network and its programming remain closely watched by evangelical conservatives. Last year when Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.) traveled to Guatemala to perform pro-bono eye surgeries, a CBN crew traveled with him and documented portions of the trip.

In the interview, Bush also said that he plans to campaign in Iowa ahead of its GOP caucuses next year.

"Absolutely," he said. "Look, I'm a really competitive guy to begin with. It's hard for me to imagine that I'm going to plan for fifth place. I mean, that's not going to happen. We're going to work hard here. I'm not going to participate in straw polls anywhere. That's a distraction, to be honest with you."

Jeb Bush Announces Plans to 'Campaign Hard' in Iowa // NBC News // Perry Bacon Jr. – May 17, 2015

DES MOINES, Iowa — Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush on Saturday declared he would aggressively campaign to win the caucuses here, ending any doubt about his participation in the first contest of the GOP primary but also opening himself up to the possibility of a defeat that could severely damage his candidacy.

With Bush trying to win here, the more than 100,000 Republicans in his state who are expected to participate in the Iowa caucuses next February will play an even more important role in winnowing a field that will likely include more than a dozen candidates. And wooing Iowa's activists will become a huge test for Bush, who is lagging well behind in current polls in Iowa, despite being considered one of the leading candidates in the GOP race based on his fundraising strength.

"I'm going to campaign hard here," Bush said at a press conference in Iowa City. "It's my intention to win. Period. I'm a competitive person, my hope is to win any place where I'm competing."

His decision echoes how Hillary Clinton handled Iowa in 2008. Despite some of her aides being wary of the state's liberal activists and floating the idea of Clinton skipping or downplaying Iowa, she opted to campaign aggressively here.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton never won over Iowa's Democrats, and defeating her in a head-to-head contest in Iowa helped vault Barack Obama to the nomination. Bush now faces the prospect of running hard in Iowa and still losing to either Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker or Florida Sen. Marco Rubio, his chief rivals for the nomination and the kind of candidates who could consolidate support in the GOP if either won in Iowa.

Iowa voters have rejected more moderate Republicans like Bush in the past two election cycles, in favor of former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee (2008) and ex-Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum (2012). Conservatives here are already wary of Bush because of his support for a pathway to legalization for undocumented immigrants and the Common Core education standards. There was some thought he would lightly campaign in Iowa and effectively concede the state to one of the conservatives in this field. Bush could then focus solely on New Hampshire, a state with many more moderate Republicans.

Instead, he is embracing the process here in Iowa. While George H.W. Bush won the caucuses in 1980 and George W. Bush finished first here 20 years later, the number of very conservative, evangelical Christians and Tea Party supporters are likely to outnumber moderate Republicans in 2016, a huge challenge for Bush.

In the 2012 caucuses, Santorum narrowly defeated Mitt Romney, with very conservative voters favoring the former senator 35 to 14 percent over Romney.

In this campaign cycle, Walker has emerged as the favorite in Iowa, leading in polls and drawing strong enthusiasm from party activists. Santorum and Huckabee are running again, with deep ties to Iowa's evangelical community, and Texas Sen. Ted Cruz and Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal are also courting these blocs.

So Bush will face an electorate that may not be favorable to him. And while Romney won about 25% of the vote in both 2008 and 2012 here, even that part of the electorate will be challenging for Bush.

Walker is making inroads with more moderate Republicans, holding a fundraiser on Saturday with Chad Airhart, the recorder in Dallas County and an influential figure in Iowa politics.

Airhart endorsed Romney during the 2012 campaign, but opted to back Walker for 2016 despite courting from Bush allies.

"I really like the governor's populist appeal," he said of Walker.

Bush spent Saturday here, in only his second visit to Iowa since he started running for president. Dogged this week by questions about his views on the Iraq War, Bush told voters in Dubuque, "I'm proud of my brother."

"He did what he thought was right," Bush said.

And Bush's trademark stubbornness was displayed on another issue as well. Asked about the presidential straw poll in Boone, Iowa in August, Bush emphatically rejected the idea he would compete in the event, which is a fundraiser for the Republican Party of Iowa.

Straw polls are "not relevant," Bush said.

But the candidate is not writing off Iowa. After the Lincoln Day Dinner in Des Moines on Saturday night, Bush, like the other GOP candidates, hosted a small reception for Iowa Republicans, posing for more than 100 pictures.

Several of the Iowans asked Bush for reassurance that he would be coming to the state more often. He told them each of them yes, repeating his line about being competitive and determined to win here.

Bush insists he's not writing off Iowa // Politico // Eli Stokols – May 18, 2015

Skepticism runs high about the former Florida governor's intentions for the February caucuses.

DES MOINES, Iowa – His brother won the caucuses here in 2000. His likely campaign manager is a veteran Iowa campaign strategist. And as he stumped around the state this weekend, Jeb Bush repeatedly insisted he's going to compete hard in next year's caucuses.

Even so, skepticism runs high about Bush's intentions for next February's caucuses.

Between his low standing in state polls, the socially conservative bent of the Iowa GOP base and his decision to skip the state's straw poll in August, Bush has lots of incentives to give up on Iowa next year. Republicans here know it, which is why the former Florida governor spent his weekend reassuring them he hasn't already written off the state as a lost cause.

"I'm going to be here. I'm here right now!" Bush told reporters Saturday after appearing at a fundraiser in Iowa City for Sen. Chuck Grassley. "Why would I be here if I wasn't going to compete in Iowa?"

From Dubuque to Iowa City to the state GOP's Lincoln Dinner in Des Moines Saturday night, Bush threw everything he had into the effort to persuade Iowans he doesn't plan to blow off the state. His intensely private wife, Columba, and his son Jeb Jr., both accompanied him to Dubuque, where he held an hour-long town hall. He took 11 questions from the crowd there, and then a few dozen "selfies" with attendees before leaving. He met privately with several top donors, county chairs and elected officials — some of whom have been alarmed by Bush's laissez faire approach to Iowa so far — prior to his speech at the Republican Party dinner; when it was over, he greeted a long receiving line of supporters in his hospitality suite.

The decision to do a full day of in-state events — not just the dinner — wasn't lost on Republicans here. David Kochel, the top Iowa strategist now working for Bush in Miami, was happy with Bush's day introducing himself to Iowa Republicans.

"They don't know him yet, but there's time for us to let people get to know him," he said. "When they get to know him, they're going to like him."

Bush has much more work to do to convince Iowans that he's truly invested. After being absent from the state since early March, he felt the lash of state GOP chairman Jeff Kauffman on Twitter last week after reports first surfaced that Bush was planning to bypass the Iowa straw poll in August and attend another event outside the state.

"We hope Governor Bush rethinks his decision and realizes that grassroots will only grow in Iowa if he waters them," Kauffman wrote. "We don't buy this excuse and neither will Iowans."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

When reporters asked Bush Saturday about his reasons for skipping the August 8 straw poll, he hinted at a broader strategy that doesn't hinge on the Hawkeye State.

"It's not relevant," Bush said of the straw poll. "What's relevant is running a campaign, creating a strategy, building a good team towards success, which is in the primaries, and doing it in a way that makes it possible to win the general, which is the whole point of this."

According to a number of people close to the candidate, Bush's strategy rests on simply doing well enough in February's earliest contests to come out of South Carolina as one of the two or three leading candidates — in other words, a first-place finish in Iowa win isn't essential.

When Bush met the traveling press in Iowa City Saturday afternoon, the second time he got a question about the straw poll and his seriousness about the caucuses, he turned it back around at the reporter.

"Would you aspire to fourth place in anything? Or sixth place?" Bush asked. His point: his own competitive nature wouldn't allow him accept such a weak performance. Besides, a win for Bush might be defined as a finish anywhere in the top three.

As long as Bush doesn't get embarrassed in Iowa and potentially wins in New Hampshire, the campaign's anticipated financial advantage could be the difference-maker, especially in March when crowded primary days take place and only the most well-funded campaigns will be able to compete across the map.

To get to March, Bush still must deliver a respectable performance in Iowa in February, and that'll mean investing the kind of resources here to ensure a win, place or show finish.

"He'll signal with his time how much of a priority Iowa is," said Zach Nunn, a Republican state legislator. "Any time he comes to Iowa is a serious indicator that he sees Iowa as a place he needs to do well."

The most recent polling shows Bush in seventh place among likely Republican presidential hopefuls with just 5 percent support among Iowa primary voters — a sign that Bush, who'd only made one trip here before last weekend, has a lot of work to do here. Bush's father and brother both had campaigned far earlier and more often than Jeb Bush at this point in the election.

"Does he have a one or two-state strategy like some other candidates? Of course not," said former Iowa GOP chairman Matt Strawn. "The challenge is to make sure those activists who are predisposed to support Bush are seeing him here. They want to see a candidate making a commitment to Iowa before they make a commitment to Gov. Bush."

In the end, the size of the GOP field could work to Bush's advantage. With as many as 19 potential candidates, it's possible that evangelicals won't coalesce around one clear choice and the vote will be splintered — which would open the door for a steady and solid establishment candidate like Bush to finish near the top in Iowa.

"If the evangelical vote gets split up, it's possible that someone can win the Iowa caucuses with 20 percent of the vote," Strawn said.

When he opened his town hall meeting Saturday morning at Loras College in Dubuque, Bush spoke to those who doubt his prospects in Iowa — or the depth of his commitment to playing here — by pointing to his father's 1980 come-from-behind win in the Iowa caucuses.

“I’ll just remind everybody that’s interested in political history,” Bush said. “He started here in Iowa as an asterisk, literally an asterisk, and he won the Iowa caucuses.”

Marco Rubio Struggles To Explain Whether He Thinks Invading Iraq Was A 'Mistake' // Huffington Post // Samantha Lachman - May 17, 2015

Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) struggled to reconcile past statements he has made about the 2003 invasion of Iraq with an answer on whether he thought the decision to invade was a mistake during an appearance on "Fox News Sunday."

Last week, Rubio was asked whether he would have still authorized a war, knowing what is known now about Iraq and its lack of weapons of mass destruction. He unequivocally said no.

“Not only would I not have been in favor of it, President [George W.] Bush would not have been in favor of it, and he said so," Rubio said following a foreign policy speech at the Council of Foreign Relations in New York.

On Sunday, however, Rubio rejected the rationale behind host Chris Wallace's question about whether the senator and 2016 presidential contender had flip-flopped on the issue, since he had said in March that it was not a mistake to invade the country. Wallace and Rubio spoke over each other as they attempted to sort out the semantics of the question.

"Those are two different questions; it was not a mistake," Rubio said. "The question was whether it was a mistake, and my answer was it was not a mistake. I still say it was not a mistake, because the president was presented with intelligence that said Iraq had weapons of mass destruction ... [Bush] made the right decision based on what he knew at that time. We learned subsequently that information was wrong. My answer is, at the time, it appears the intelligence was wrong."

Rubio also commended President Barack Obama for ordering the recent raid that killed Abu Sayyaf, a senior Islamic State leader who helped direct the group's oil, gas and financial operations.

"It's been a successful raid and it's good news. Any time you can degrade or take away top leadership of an organization, it's a good step forward," he said, cautioning that the Islamic State continues to pose a threat. "It remains a risk, but we want to congratulate the men and women in uniform that carried it out and the president for undertaking the mission."

Rubio says 'we don't have the votes' for broad immigration bill // Reuters // John Whitesides - May 17, 2015

Republican presidential contender Marco Rubio said on Sunday he still favors immigration reform, but he has accepted the need for a piece-by-piece legislative approach because "we don't have the votes to pass" a comprehensive measure.

Rubio, a U.S. senator from Florida, said on "Fox News Sunday" there were fewer votes in Congress for comprehensive immigration reform now than two years ago, when he worked with Senate Democrats to help pass a comprehensive bill that included a path to citizenship for those in the country illegally.

That measure died in the House of Representatives amid conservative opposition. Rubio, who faced criticism from the right over his work on the Senate bill, now backs a piecemeal approach that would begin with border security.

"I still believe we need to do immigration reform," said Rubio, the son of Cuban immigrants. "The problem is we can't do it in one big piece of legislation. The votes aren't there" in the House of Representatives.

Rubio is one of a half-dozen Republicans running to be the party's nominee in the November 2016 election, with more expected in the race soon.

Some critics have accused Rubio of backing away from comprehensive reform to placate conservatives who will play a big role in the Republican presidential primaries. Asked why he would not fight for comprehensive reform, Rubio said he was dealing with political realities.

"The context in which we are having this debate is much different," he said.

He cited Republican House Majority Leader Eric Cantor's primary loss last year in part because of his support for comprehensive immigration legislation, as well as Republican opposition to President Barack Obama's executive order last year easing the threat of deportation for millions of undocumented residents.

"Clearly, leaders stand for the idea you need to do something, but you also have to deal with the reality that in the political process people are going to vote based on what they're hearing from their constituents and others," he said.

Rubio's Cash Needs: Run For President, Make Home Repairs // CBS Local // May 17, 2015

WASHINGTON (CBSMiami/AP) — Sen. Marco Rubio recently cashed out some of his retirement accountslast year. This is because the Republican presidential says he is not poor, but not rich either — and he had some unexpected expenses to account for besides his campaign.

The Florida senator tells "Fox News Sunday" he wanted the cash because he's running for president — but also because his refrigerator broke and "that was $3,000," his air conditioner had to be replaced and his kids' schools are getting more expensive.

Rubio sold retirement funds worth more than $68,000 last September, according to his personal financial disclosure statement. He made the sale even though he apparently had ample cash in the bank. He reported between $100,000 and $250,000 in a checking account and between $50,000 and $100,000 in a money market account at the end of 2014.

Rand Paul: 'We still have chaos' in Iraq // WaPo // Sean Sullivan - May 17, 2015

Iraq is in disarray and the threat posed by Islamist militants there has placed the United States at greater risk than before, Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.) said in an interview set to broadcast Sunday morning.

Paul said the question of whether the 2003 U.S.-led invasion of Iraq was justified is an "important" one and not merely "hypothetical," offering the latest input on an issue that has been difficult for the Republican presidential field to navigate in recent days.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I think when [Saddam] Hussein was toppled, we got chaos," Paul told NBC's "Meet the Press," according to a transcript provided by the network. "We still have chaos in — in Iraq. I think it emboldened Iran. I think — we now have the rise of radical Islam in Ira, as well."

Paul, who is running for president, was asked whether his position on Iraq puts him at odds with Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.), a White House rival who has said that "the world is a better place because Saddam Hussein doesn't run Iraq."

Paul's response: "I don't think that's exactly how I put it."

He continued: "We are more at risk for attack from people who are training, organizing and fighting in Iraq than we were before." Paul called the Islamic State militant group, which controls many areas in Iraq and Syria, "more of an aberration than even Hussein was."

In particular, questions about Iraq have tripped up Jeb Bush, a likely presidential contender. He gave different answers last week to the question of whether the invasion ordered by his brother was justified given that we now know that Iraq did not have weapons of mass destruction.

Bush eventually stated that he would not have gone into Iraq. Paul said Democratic presidential front-runner and former secretary of state Hillary Clinton should face similar scrutiny.

"They should ask her, 'Was it a good idea to invade Libya? Did that make us less safe? Did it make it more chaotic? ," said Paul, adding, "I think the war in Iraq is a good question and still a current question, but so is the question of, 'Should we have gone into Libya?'"

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker (R), a potential presidential candidate, vouched for George W. Bush's decision-making on Iraq at the time of the invasion in an interview on CBS's "Face The Nation."

"I did stand up and defend the president, President Bush, that I did say I think any president, regardless of party, probably would've made a similar decision to what President Bush did at the time, with the information he had available," said Walker.

Paul also reiterated his criticism of the National Security Agency's sweeping surveillance programs and his problems with the Patriot Act. Key provisions in the act are set to expire June 1.

Asked whether he would do away with the NSA as president, Paul responded that he would not. Instead, he said, he would direct the agency to intensify its efforts to combat threats to the nation.

"I would have the NSA target their activities, more and more, towards our enemies," the senator said. "I think if you're not spending so much time and money collecting the information of innocent Americans, maybe we could've spent more time knowing that one of the Tsarnaev boys, one of the Boston bombers, had gone back to Chechnya."

Sen. Rand Paul Does Not Commit to Patriot Act Filibuster // NBC News // Dale Armbruster - May 17, 2015

As fights over the temporarily reauthorizing and changing of the Patriot Act loom, one prominent critic did not commit to battling a possible extension ahead of the June 1 deadline.

In an appearance on NBC's "Meet the Press," Sen. Rand Paul did not indicate whether he would filibuster an extension, instead reiterating his support for the end of bulk data collection.

"Really, it ought to stop," Paul told Chuck Todd. "If the president's obeying the law, he should stop it immediately and we shouldn't be doing this. I don't want to replace it with another system."

Paul, R-Kentucky, has long been a vocal opponent of the law that expanded the government's surveillance authority in 2001. It has been reauthorized three times, in 2005, 2006 and 2011.

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., has proposed an extension that would give Congress until July 31 to work out a deal. The expiring provision, Section 215, is the basis for the NSA's bulk collection of U.S. phone records. The proposal comes on the heels of a May 7 federal appeals court decision that ruled that the NSA's interpretation of the provision is incorrect, and that the program is illegal.

Paul did announce that he would not eliminate the National Security Agency if elected President, arguing the agency's time could be better spent tracking potential foreign threats.

"I would have the NSA target their activities, more and more, towards our enemies," Paul said. "I think if you're not spending so much time and money collecting the information of innocent Americans, maybe we could've spent more time knowing that one of the Tsarnaev boys, one of the Boston bombers, had gone back to Chechnya."

Christie enters new stage as he eyes 2016: Bashing fellow Republicans // NJ // Matt Arco - May 17, 2015

TRENTON — For Gov. Chris Christie, it was the next and perhaps final step of a pre-presidential campaign.

After months of stumping in the key states, meeting with potential voters and donors, holding town halls and making the requisite attacks on President Obama and Democratic 2016 frontrunner Hillary Clinton, the New Jersey governor took it to a new level last week.

He went after fellow Republicans also eyeing the White House.

After he delivered his second national policy speech in another trip to first-primary state New Hampshire on Tuesday, Christie accused former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush and Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker of not bringing substance to their likely campaigns.

"I've given two really substantive speeches, specific speeches, and I don't know of anybody else who's doing it," Christie said. "You don't see Jeb doing this. You don't see Walker doing this."

He added: "I think it's really important if you're going to consider getting involved in this conversation. You should be specific."

A day later, Christie went even further and attacked Bush for refusing to answer a question about the Iraqi war.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Listen, I understand that in politics sometimes there are certain questions you just don't want to answer," Christie told Laura Ingraham during an interview on her talk-radio show. "But I think you have to answer questions like this. These are questions that are extraordinarily important for the country and I think if you're considering running for president (that) you need to answer the question."

It was a calculated move, said Larry Sabato, director of the Center for Politics at the University of Virginia.

"The number one goal in this field is to raise tons of money. But the number two goal is to somehow distinguish yourself," Sabato said. "And obviously, in his mind at least, he's in the establishment category competing mainly with Jeb Bush."

The Bush moment was made possible in part because the former Florida governor spent days fumbling for an answer to a question about that Iraq war synonymous with his brother's presidency. It quickly pinned Bush — and not Christie — as the target of last week's media scrutiny.

Sabato noted that as Christie marches closer to a presidential campaign, he and other Republicans won't be shy about taking sots at one another instead of focusing only on Clinton.

Going on the offensive in campaigns isn't foreign Christie, who's developed a national identity as the brash, no-nonsense governor. But voters didn't see Christie's tough style during his re-election campaign in 2013, largely because he began — and ended — it with a huge lead over Democrat Barbara Buono and never had to punch hard. He fought an aggressive campaign in unseating Democrat Jon Corzine in 2009.

"The reality is that we haven't seen Governor Christie in a full campaign since his first campaign as governor," said Brigid Harrison, a professor of political science at Montclair State University. "He's certainly taken the reputation as one of the politicians who will knock down his opponents. He's adept at this strategy."

The political experts said Christie has another reason to attack his fellow Republicans: He's got a lot of ground to cover because he's hitting historic lows in voter support back home in New Jersey and is struggling to get into the top tier of GOP presidential contenders.

"It's mid-May, so it's time. If he's actually going to do it, it's definitely time," Sabato said.

Christie is scheduled to return to New Hampshire on Monday to deliver another policy speech and host his fifth early-voting state town hall meeting.

Santorum and Clinton set to visit Mason City // KIMT // Allie Krug – May 17, 2015

Republican Rick Santorum

KIMT News 3 – Two high profile politicians eyeing the presidency will be making their way into north Iowa on Monday.

Republican Rick Santorum, who hasn’t officially announced a presidential campaign yet, will be meeting with voters as he hosts a town hall meeting at the Pizza Ranch in Mason City, and one of his democratic opponents, former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, will be stopping in town for an event at a private home.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

According to local political analyst, Bennett Smith, this is an important trip for both presidential hopeful since they have a lot of ground to cover while they're here. "It's important for Hillary Clinton to get into the state because part of the concern with her campaign is that she hasn't been here much and that she hasn't been very accessible," Smith explains.

Clinton's event is closed to the public, something she has been scrutinized for, however KIMT News 3 will have a camera there.

"It's also important for Rick Santorum," Smith adds, "since the slot that he filled with social conservatives is now being filled by Gov. Scott Walker so, he needs to get in the state and spend more time with voters, which he has been doing."

Iowa has proven very popular lately, this weekend seven major republicans spoke at the Lincoln Dinner fundraiser in Des Moines.

Fiorina 'a fireball' at GOP Lincoln Dinner // USA Today // Jennifer Jacobs – May 17, 2015

DES MOINES -- Republicans exulted in what they see as a smorgasbord of good choices in their 2016 presidential lineup, but former CEO Carly Fiorina seemed to steal the show at the Iowa GOP's Lincoln Dinner on Saturday night.

The audience of 1,400 stopped just short of booing when dinner organizers cut the sound to her microphone when she reached the strict 10-minute speaking limit set for all 11 presidential hopefuls.

One of Fiorina's best-received lines: "I was asked whether a woman's hormones prevent her from serving in the Oval Office. OK, ladies, this is a test: Can you think of a single instance in which a man's judgment was clouded by his hormones? Including in the Oval Office?"

"She was like a fireball," said one dinner guest, Tanya Manatt, a 43-year-old Johnston resident who owns a bridal boutique. "She had a lot of energy, and she's not intimidated."

The night's next most popular hopefuls — based on crowd reaction, a sampling of interviews with dinner guests and observations of the traffic in each contender's hospitality room after the speeches — were three governors: former Texas Gov. Rick Perry, former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush and Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker.

"As far as covering the bases and making me feel like he would be a good leader, Jeb Bush was next best," Manatt said. "I did not expect that. I didn't want to like him."

A big honorable mention, for humor and a touching personal story about the deaths of both of his parents when he was a young man, seemed to go to South Carolina U.S. Sen. Lindsey Graham.

Graham offered a steady stream of quips as soon as he took the stage.

"Chuck Grassley. Is he still here? The one thing I've learned about this dinner: It was free for Chuck or he wouldn't have been here."

Iowa GOP Chairman Jeff Kaufmann told the audience on Saturday at the Lincoln Dinner in Des Moines that the GOP is bringing together all kinds of Republicans. “We are a united party, and media — take that to the rest of the United States!” he said. (Photo: Bryon Houlgrave/The Register)

But there were some gasps when Graham, in a serious moment, said: "If you're thinking about joining al-Qaeda or ISIS, I'm not going to call a judge, I'm going to call a drone, and we will kill you. We're at war, and I'm tired of treating the war as a crime."

The 11 who auditioned for the role of presidential nominee during the dinner at the Iowa Events Center were Fiorina, Perry, Bush, Walker, Graham, retired doctor Ben Carson, Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal, former New York Gov. George Pataki, Kentucky U.S. Sen. Rand Paul, former Pennsylvania U.S. Sen. Rick Santorum and New York reality TV star Donald Trump.

Several audience members said they thought Perry and Bush overperformed, while Walker underperformed, but still did a good job pitching his status as an adopted Iowan of sorts and hitting hard on national security and "safety."

"Rick Perry had a lot of energy, no notes and definite ideas about what he wanted to do and the experience to back it up as a former military man. I liked him so much more than I did four years ago," said Shelley Pitts of Cumming, who works at Von Maur. "And Carly. I loved her. I just loved everything she said."

In his speech, Perry knocked common core education standards, proposed rebuilding the U.S. military and bemoaned an "underlying pessimism we see in this country" about the future.

"If we will unleash people from over-taxation, over-regulation, over-litigation ... we will have the greatest days in America ahead," Perry said.

Although several audience members said Bush seemed a little nervous — he stumbled on some words and referred to his notes more than others did — they praised how he explained his conservative record in Florida and the passion he exhibited on education issues.

"To me, Bush exceeded expectations," said Bill Schickel, a former Iowa GOP official. Schickel also listed Perry, Graham and Fiorina as favorites.

Bush said whether people like it or not, he's proud of the fact that he's "George and Barbara's boy" and that "W's my brother." Bush talked about his successes as Florida governor in job creation, school choice and protecting "the most vulnerable in society," including the unborn, the disabled and the frail.

Walker showed a photo of himself at age 7 that was shot, he said, after he and his brother went door to door raising money for a state flag at the Plainfield City Hall. His family lived there in the mid-1970s. Walker was one of the only ones to insert religion into his speech, talking about his recent trip to Israel and how he was moved to see the spot where "literally Christ fed the 5,000."

Paul zoned in on civil liberties issues, arguing that Americans don't have to "give up what our founding fathers fought for in order to catch terrorists."

Carson called division, the economy and a failure to lead the world the three biggest problems facing America.

Jindal said two major threats the country faces are Islamic terrorism abroad and the trampling of religious liberties at home. A third threat: the polices of President Barack Obama and former U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, he said.

Santorum said Republicans need to remember the 74 percent of Americans who lack a college degree, many of whom still struggle economically.

Pataki noted that he was governor when the airplanes hit the World Trade Center towers on Sept. 11, 2001. But today, "the greatest threat to our freedom," he said, is an ever-encroaching government. "It's not an imminent threat, but it's a very real threat," he said.

Trump, a real estate mogul turned reality TV star, said he can build a wall on the U.S. southern border ("I'm a good builder") and has already created tens of thousands of jobs. Trump expressed indignation that people — namely the news media — don't believe he'll run. He said he'll make an announcement in June that's "going to surprise a lot of people."

Not everyone in the crowd could take Trump seriously.

"Trump! I was trying to hold it in. I didn't want to laugh too much," said the Rev. Lawrence Davis, a 63-year-old Des Moines pastor. "Now, Carly, she was dynamite. She knew what she was talking about."

The hospitality rooms weren't all the same size so it was hard to judge, but a nonscientific survey throughout the night showed Walker's room, in a prime spot at the bottom of the escalators leading from the banquet hall, was the most packed at first.

"Cold beer!" said a sign out front. Wisconsin cheese and Miller beer were being served inside.

Long lines waited for snapshots with Fiorina, Carson and Trump, the night's celebrities.

But near the end of the evening, the biggest crowds had migrated to Bush's room, which was unadorned by decorations, but had an open bar and a buffet of hors d'oeuvres.

Paul and Pataki didn't host receptions. All the other contenders drew decent-sized crowds, except Santorum.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

His Iowa chairman, state Rep. Walt Rogers, R-Cedar Falls, said the small crowds showed that "people know Rick well. Everyone's kicking the tires on everyone else. But they'll come back to an old, solid four wheels like Rick."

Paul Ryan: House will approve Obama's trade effort // CNN // Eric Bradner - May 17, 2015

Washington – Rep. Paul Ryan said Sunday the House has the votes to approve President Barack Obama's free trade initiative.

The House Ways and Means Committee chairman is sponsoring a bill that would hand Obama "trade promotion authority" -- which would allow him to negotiate the 12-country Trans-Pacific Partnership and submit it to Congress for an up-or-down vote with no amendments.

In an unusual alignment, Republicans are aligning with Obama on the issue, while members of his own party -- as well as some tea partiers -- oppose him.

"We will have the votes. We're doing very well. We're gaining a lot of steam and momentum," Ryan, a Wisconsin Republican, told CNN's Brianna Keilar Sunday on "State of the Union."

Ryan argued that the deal, which covers a total of 40% of the world's economy, is key to maintaining U.S. economic influence in a region where countries are increasingly falling into China's orbit.

He said trade promotion authority gives lawmakers a chance to instruct the White House on what to negotiate in the deal.

"There's a misnomer," he said. "It's really not granting the President authority; it's actually Congress asserting its prerogatives, its authority in how trade agreements are done."

Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell also praised Obama for his pro-trade deal lobbying effort.

"President Obama has done his country a service by taking on his base and pushing back on some of the more ridiculous rhetoric we've heard," McConnell told ABC's George Stephanopoulos Sunday on "This Week."

He also predicted the measure will pass the Senate.

"Yes, we'll pass it. We'll pass it later this week," he said.

The Senate advanced trade promotion authority beyond a major procedural hurdle last week and could vote this week. The House, though, could be closer -- with more Republicans opposing Obama and fewer Democrats backing him.

9 Are Killed in Biker Gang Shootout in Waco // NYT // Manny Fernandez Liam Stack and Alan Blinder – May 17, 2015

HOUSTON — A shootout among members of several rival motorcycle gangs in a busy shopping plaza in the Central Texas city of Waco on Sunday left at least nine bikers dead and 18 others injured, creating chaos in a sprawling parking lot packed with afternoon shoppers, law enforcement officials said.

The gunfire erupted about 12:15 p.m. outside a Twin Peaks Restaurant, where members of the motorcycle clubs had gathered. The fight spilled into the parking lot, initially involving just fists and feet, but escalating quickly to chains, knives, clubs and firearms. Waco police officers were already at the scene when the confrontation unfolded because they had anticipated problems as hundreds of bikers from at least five groups gathered at the shopping plaza.

“There were multiple people on the scene firing weapons at each other,” Sgt. Patrick Swanton, a Waco Police Department spokesman, said at a news conference. “They then turned on our officers. Our officers returned gunfire, wounding and possibly killing several.”

Law enforcement officials said the shootout was the worst violence in Waco since the siege on the Branch Davidian compound in 1993 that left 86 people dead. On Sunday, eight members of motorcycle clubs were killed at the scene and another died at a hospital, Sergeant Swanton said. The injured were taken to hospitals with gunshot and stab wounds.

No officers, shoppers or bystanders were injured. The authorities said their decision to place officers outside the restaurant before the gunfire erupted most likely saved lives.

“There were so many rounds fired from bad-guy weapons here, it is amazing that innocent civilians were not injured here,” said Sergeant Swanton, who added that investigators expected to recover about 100 weapons. “In 34 years of law enforcement, this is the worst crime scene — the most violent crime scene — that I have ever been involved in. There are dead people still there. There is blood everywhere.”

The police did not identify the groups involved, but photographs of the members who were arrested showed a number of them in leather jackets bearing the names of at least three motorcycle clubs: Bandidos, Cossacks and Scimitars.

Hours after the shooting, police officials were still issuing messages on social media warning people to stay away from the shopping plaza, the Central Texas Marketplace, saying that it was closed because it was unsafe. “Officers are continuing to arrest individuals coming to the scene with weapons,” one of the department’s Facebook postings read. “This is not the time to sight see as we are dealing with very dangerous individuals.”

The police detained numerous people involved in the fight, Sergeant Swanton said, and arrested three bikers who were carrying weapons and tried to reach the scene after the fighting had quieted down. He said they would be charged with engaging in organized crime. Late Sunday, Sergeant Swanton said the police were holding at least 100 people for questioning.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Dozens of officers and medics from local, state and federal agencies converged on the Central Texas Marketplace. A spokeswoman for the F.B.I. office in San Antonio said agents were assisting the Waco police in the investigation.

The Twin Peaks Restaurant had hosted motorcycle gang members in the past, the police said. The authorities made little effort on Sunday to conceal their frustration with the restaurant's managers, who they said had previously been uncooperative in dealing with the Police Department's security concerns about biker gatherings there.

"We have attempted to work with the local management of Twin Peaks to no avail," Sergeant Swanton said. "They have continued to allow these bikers to gather here, and this is the culmination of what has occurred." He added: "What happened here today could have been avoided if we had had management at a local establishment listen to their police department and assist us. They failed to do that."

On Sunday, at least 12 Waco police officers, as well as officers with the state's top law enforcement agency, the Texas Department of Public Safety, worked to secure the area before the shootout started because officials "expected issues," Sergeant Swanton said.

"Apparently, the management wanted them here," he said, "so we didn't have any say-so on whether they could be here or not."

Twin Peaks is a national restaurant chain with several Texas locations. The restaurant in Waco opened last year, and company officials told a local newspaper that it would employ 150 people and be able to accommodate more than 350. In an announcement about the restaurant's opening, Twin Peaks promoted the location as the "ultimate man-cave," with at least 55 flat-screen televisions and 24 types of beer. As recently as last week, the restaurant advertised "Bike Night" on Thursdays and promised "beers, bites and bikes at the hottest place in town!"

In a statement, a spokesman for the Twin Peaks Restaurant chain emphasized that the shooting had occurred outside the restaurant.

"We were shocked by the shootings that took place in the parking lot of our franchised restaurant in Waco and are fully reviewing all the circumstances surrounding it," the spokesman, Rick Van Warner, said. "We are thankful no employees, guests or police were injured in this senseless violence outside the restaurant, and our sympathies are with the families of those killed."

Later, in a phone interview, Mr. Van Warner said the company was "seriously considering revoking the franchise based on this situation." He added: "If any of those allegations are true that there was ample warning to potentially prevent something of this nature, then there is no way we would allow someone to continue operating under our own brand."

Jay Patel, operating partner of the Waco franchise, issued a statement Sunday night defending the restaurant's dealings with the police and saying that the managers "share in the community's trauma."

"Our priority is to provide a safe and enjoyable environment for our customers and employees, and we consider the police our partners in doing so," Mr. Patel's statement read. "Our management team has had ongoing and positive communications with the police and we will continue to work with them as we all want to keep violent crime out of our businesses and community."

Sergeant Swanton said the confrontation appeared to have “started over a parking issue,” but he declined to elaborate. Another law enforcement official said that the rival gangs needed no incitement and that simply crossing paths was enough to cause problems.

Asked if the authorities knew the names of the clubs involved, Sergeant Swanton said, “We do, but we’re not going to give them the privilege at this point of putting their names out there.” While emphasizing that the authorities were still in the early stages of an investigation, he described the biker gangs involved as “dangerous” and “hostile.”

“This is not a bunch of doctors and dentists and lawyers riding Harleys,” Sergeant Swanton said. “These are criminals on Harley-Davidsons.”

In a report on gang activity submitted last year to the governor and the state Legislature, law enforcement officials classified the Bandidos Outlaw Motorcycle Gang, known as Bandidos O.M.G., as a Tier 2 threat, the second-highest level. The report, prepared annually by the state Department of Public Safety, noted that the Bandidos were formed in the 1960s and typically avoided high-profile activities such as drive-by shootings.

Tier 2 gangs were “responsible for a disproportionate amount of crime across urban, suburban and rural areas of Texas,” the report said.

U.S. gas prices up 22 cents over past three weeks -survey // Reuters // Bill Berkrot - May 17, 2015

May 17 The average price of a gallon of regular-grade gasoline in the United States rose 22 cents over the past three weeks to $2.82, according to a Lundberg survey released on Sunday.

The average price per gallon, which has now jumped 35 cents since April 10, is the highest seen by the survey since late November, but is still nearly 93 cents lower than a year ago.

Rises in crude oil prices over the three-week period were not driven by changes in oil supplies, said Trilby Lundberg, publisher of the survey, but rather were caused by a recent weakening of the dollar against key foreign currencies.

Prices should remain relatively low for the coming summer driving season. "The chances are high that there will be small or negligible price rises from here in the national average, assuming no crude oil price spike in the near future," Lundberg said.

The price increase for the nation would have been substantially smaller if not for significant hikes in California, the state with the highest gasoline consumption, and the rest of the West Coast, Lundberg said.

In California, the average price rose 53 cents over the past three weeks to $3.76 per gallon.

Nationally, among the panel of U.S. cities included in the survey, the lowest price for a gallon of gasoline was found in Baton Rouge, Louisiana at $2.32, while Los Angeles had the highest at $3.95.

FBI: Hacker claimed to have taken over flight's engine controls // CNN // Evan Perez - May 17, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(CNN)A cybersecurity consultant told the FBI he hacked into computer systems aboard airliners up to 20 times and managed to control an aircraft engine during a flight, according to federal court documents.

Chris Roberts was detained by the FBI in April following a United Airlines flight to Syracuse, New York, after officials saw Twitter posts he made discussing hacking into the plane he was traveling on.

An FBI search warrant application filed in the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of New York describes the investigation of Roberts for possible computer crimes.

During FBI interviews in February and March, the document says, Roberts told investigators he hacked into in-flight entertainment systems aboard aircraft. He claimed to have done so 15 to 20 times from 2011 to 2014.

He also said, according to the document, that once he had hacked into the systems and then overwrote code, enabling him to issue a "CLB," or climb, command.

"He stated that he thereby caused one of the airplane engines to climb resulting in a lateral or sideways movement of the plane during one of these flights," the document says.

Roberts said he knew of vulnerabilities aboard three types of Boeing aircraft and one Airbus model. He hacked into in-flight entertainment systems made by Thales and Panasonic, he told agents, according to the document.

Canada's APTN first reported on the document.

Roberts has said on Twitter that he's been advised not to say much, but he has tweeted that his only interest is "to improve aircraft security" and accused the FBI of "incorrectly" condensing five years of his research into one paragraph.

"Lots to untangle," he tweeted.

Roberts did not immediately reply to CNN messages seeking a response, and in an interview with Wired magazine, he declined to say whether he had hacked the flight mentioned in the federal affidavit. In that article, he said a key paragraph was out of context.

"That paragraph that's in there is one paragraph out of a lot of discussions, so there is context that is obviously missing which obviously I can't say anything about," he said. "It would appear from what I've seen that the federal guys took one paragraph out of a lot of discussions and a lot of meetings and notes and just chose that one as opposed to plenty of others."

The FBI document says the bureau's agents and technical specialists "believed that Roberts had the ability and the willingness to use the equipment then with him to access or attempt to access the in-flight entertainment systems and possibly the flight control systems on any aircraft equipped with an in-flight entertainment system, and that it would endanger public safety to allow him to leave the Syracuse airport that evening with that equipment."

Roberts said he used a modified Ethernet cable to connect his laptop to an electronic box underneath his seat that controls the entertainment system. From there, he hacked into the airplane's computer nerve center, the document cites Roberts as telling the FBI.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On April 15, United Airlines told the FBI that Roberts had posted tweets about hacking into the plane he was traveling on and possibly activating the emergency passenger oxygen masks, the document says. At the time, Roberts was traveling on a United flight from Denver to Chicago, then connecting to Syracuse.

FBI agents tracked the aircraft that Roberts traveled on from Denver to Chicago and found signs of tampering and damage to electronic control boxes that connect to in-flight entertainment systems. The boxes tampered with were under the seat where Roberts sat and the one in front of his seat, the warrant application says.

Roberts told agents he didn't hack into the systems aboard the Denver-to-Chicago flight.

The FBI search warrant said agents seized computer equipment, including a laptop and an iPad, as well as thumb and external drives.

The thumb drives contained "nasty" malware, Roberts said, that could be used to compromise computer networks, according to the FBI document.

One of the plane manufacturers has cast doubt on the hacking claims. Boeing said its entertainment systems are "isolated from flight and navigation systems."

The company further said that it does not discuss its planes' design features for security reasons, but said, "It is worth noting that Boeing airplanes have more than one navigational system available to pilots. No changes to the flight plans loaded into the airplane systems can take place without pilot review and approval. In addition, other systems, multiple security measures, and flight deck operating procedures help ensure safe and secure airplane operations."

Airbus has not yet issued a response, but previously, it has said it has security measures, such as firewalls, that restrict access and the company "constantly assesses and revisits the system architecture" to make sure planes are safe.

Officials: Iraqi city of Ramadi falls to Islamic State // USA Today // Ammar Al Shamary - May 17, 2015

BAGHDAD — The Islamic State seized control of the key Iraqi city of Ramadi on Sunday, despite stepped up U.S.-led airstrikes targeting extremists in the region, according to officials in Anbar province.

"Ramadi has fallen," Muhannad Haimour, a spokesman for Anbar province, said as Iraqi forces withdrew from the city "The city was completely taken. ... It was a gradual deterioration. The military is fleeing."

The U.S. Central Command pushed back against reports that Islamic State militants control the city and said Ramadi remains "contested."

Ramadi, the provincial capital of the western Anbar province, is the latest battleground in the Iraqi government's efforts to drive out Islamic State militants from areas the militants seized last year. With the help of U.S.-led airstrikes, the Iraqi forces and Kurdish fighters had made gains against the Islamic State elsewhere in the country, including re-capturing the northern city of Tikrit.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Over the last month, 165 U.S.-led airstrikes had been conducted on Ramadi to assist Iraqi troops battling the Islamic State.

Prime Minister Haider al-Abadi appeared on state television earlier Sunday and ordered his country's security forces not to abandon their posts in Anbar province. He also ordered Shiite militias to go into the Sunni-dominated region, despite concerns of sparking sectarian violence, the Associated Press reported.

Athal al-Fahdawi, a member of the Anbar province council, said the Islamic State launched a large offensive Sunday and had taken control of most of the city after initially capturing government buildings late last week.

He said Iraqi forces withdrew to outside of Ramadi after holding onto two areas in the northern part of the city. That followed four bombings targeting police officers defending the southern district of Malaab, after which fierce fighting broke out, al-Fahdawi said. The attacks killed almost a dozen officers.

The Islamic State posted a message claiming its fighters held the entire city of Ramadi, the AP reported. The message, posted on a militant website frequented by the group, said the Islamic State held the 8th Brigade army base, as well as tanks and missile launchers left behind by fleeing soldiers.

Iraqi officials said they were waiting for more troops to arrive.

"Iraq authorities have sent reinforcements to Ramadi and are located in the outskirts of the city but didn't engage till this moment with (Islamic State) militants," Ramadi Mayor Dalaf al-Kubaisi said. "The Iraqi prime minster has sent special forces, but they are still waiting for more troops to start the clearing operation to kick the militants out of the city."

Ramadi was largely evacuated after the Islamic State captured much of the city by Friday.

The offensive began after areas of the city fell under Islamic State control earlier this month. Last week, the Islamic State, also known as ISIL or ISIS, targeted military positions in the city with six truck bombs and a bulldozer, described as a massive attack that overwhelmed Iraqi soldiers.

In recent days, the Pentagon has sought to downplay the significance of the gains the Islamic State made in Ramadi, while insisting the militant group was on the defensive in the north and west of Iraq compared to last year.

"We firmly believe (ISIL) is on the defensive throughout Iraq and Syria, attempting to hold previous gains, while conducting small-scale, localized harassing attacks, occasional complex or high-profile attacks, in order to feed their information and propaganda apparatus," Brigadier Gen. Thomas Weidley, chief of staff of the Combined Joint Task Force-Operation Inherent Resolve, told reporters on Friday.

In neighboring Najaf and Karbala provinces, residents began shoring up their borders with Anbar province and deployed thousands of fighters of local militias into the desert, officials said.

At the same time, tribal leaders of Anbar province held a news conference Sunday in the town of Khalidiya demanding the government send more troops and fighters to secure the province.

Hakem al-Zameli, an Iraqi member of parliament, said he had concerns over sending militia fighters to Anbar province. "We could come under attack of (friendly fire)," he said.

The Iraqi military later issued a statement, saying, "Victory will be in the side of Iraq because Iraq is defending its freedom and dignity." It did not offer any details about the ongoing fighting.

Saudi-Led Airstrikes Resume in Yemen as Truce Ends // NYT // Mohammed Ali Kalfood and Kareem Fahim - May 17, 2015

SANA, Yemen — A military coalition led by Saudi Arabia resumed airstrikes in Yemen on Sunday, hours after the expiration of a five-day humanitarian cease-fire between the coalition and Houthi rebels.

Residents in the southern city of Aden reported warplanes flying overhead late Sunday and the sound of airstrikes falling on what appeared to be Houthi-controlled neighborhoods in the city.

There had been no official statement from Saudi Arabia about whether it intended to renew the truce when it lapsed at 11 p.m. on Sunday. International aid agencies, as well as the United Nations envoy to Yemen, had called for an extension in order to continue delivering relief supplies to Yemen, which has been under an air and sea blockade since the Saudi-led coalition began its offensive against the Houthis in late March.

The escalation of the fighting on Sunday appeared to threaten a frenzied relief effort that had sought to take advantage of the break in the fighting. On Sunday, aid workers acknowledged that those efforts so far had been insufficient, given the scale of the crisis in Yemen, a deeply poor country that relies almost entirely on imports for basic goods.

Emergency supplies, delivered by chartered planes and rickety wooden dhows during the truce, gave relief to only a fraction of those in need, relief workers said.

Unicef said it had been able to resupply health care centers, activate mobile medical teams in rural areas affected by the fighting and supply fuel that allowed local authorities to run water systems. The group also delivered solar-power refrigerators to keep vaccines cold in a country starved of electricity.

“It’s nowhere near enough,” said Julien Harneis, Unicef’s Yemen representative. “A country of 26 million people was essentially cut off from any commercial shipping as a result of the way the arms embargo is being implemented,” he said, referring to the Saudi-led blockade.

Ships that were able to dock during the truce provided a “minute percentage of the amount of goods that need to come into the country for any normal life,” Mr. Harneis said.

André Heller Pérache, of Doctors Without Borders in Yemen, said the shortage of fuel, which had been devastating, hardly eased during the cease-fire.

“Hospitals are still scrambling to find fuel for generators,” he said. Without fuel for cars, people struggled to reach hospitals. “The capital city is dark at night.”

Saudi Arabia proposed the cease-fire this month as it faced growing criticism of its military campaign against the Houthis, a rebel group from northern Yemen that had taken control of the capital and other parts of the country and forced the government of President Abdu Rabbu Mansour Hadi into exile.

Hundreds of airstrikes by the Saudi-led coalition of Arab states failed to stop advances by the Houthis in Aden and the city of Taiz. The combination of the bombing campaign and a brutal offensive by pro-Houthi forces has killed more than 1,400, most of them civilians.

The cease-fire halted airstrikes on Sana after weeks of bombing, but fighting continued in Taiz and elsewhere. It remained unclear whether the airstrikes on Sunday signaled a full-scale resumption of the war or were a deft attempt by the Saudis to restore a military advantage, and could be followed by another truce.

Speaking on Sunday at a conference on the Yemen crisis in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia, a special envoy from the United Nations read a statement from Secretary General Ban Ki-moon that called for all parties to come together to resolve the conflict and urged an extension of the cease-fire.

The conference, convened by Saudi Arabia, consisted of only one side in the domestic conflict, bringing together Yemen factions and regional organizations that support the effort to restore Mr. Hadi to power. It excluded any representatives of the Houthi movement or its allies among the backers of Ali Abdullah Saleh, Yemen's former president.

"The humanitarian truce should turn into a permanent cease-fire," the envoy, Ismail Ould Cheikh Ahmed, said, reading the statement. There was "no solution to the crisis but comprehensive dialogue that will not exclude anyone."

In Seoul, Kerry Rallies Region Against North Korea // WSJ // Jeyup S. Kwaak - May 18, 2015

SEOUL—U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry on Monday played up coordination between Washington and other nations to pressure North Korea to give up its nuclear weapons program but underlined the rogue regime's current unwillingness to commit to such a path.

Speaking in Seoul, Mr. Kerry said the five members of the forum that had previously tried to persuade Pyongyang to denuclearize—the U.S., China, Russia, Japan and South Korea—are discussing measures to ramp up pressure on North Korea. He didn't provide details.

"Never has the international community been as united as we are now," Mr. Kerry said, referring to calls for North Korea to denuclearize.

Officials from the U.S. and China, a key economic and military ally to North Korea, will meet in Washington next month to discuss "specific steps," Mr. Kerry said. He also mentioned sanctions as a measure under consideration.

President Barack Obama's North Korea policy has taken criticism from experts who say that the isolated state in recent years appears undeterred in its pursuit of nuclear bombs and the missiles to deliver them.

A recent estimate from Beijing puts North Korea's nuclear-warhead count at 20 at the end of last year and potentially double that by next year. That estimate is higher than many assessments from the U.S.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

North Korea earlier this month also claimed to have conducted a successful test of a submarine-launched ballistic missile. U.S. and South Korean officials have said North Korea remains in the initial stages of developing the missile.

North Korea regularly test-fires a range of rockets, including ballistic missiles that are banned under United Nations sanctions. The regime has carried out three nuclear-detonation tests, the last in early 2013.

Mr. Kerry repeated the U.S. position that North Korea must show a genuine commitment to denuclearization before any talks can begin. But he said Pyongyang so far has “not come even close.” He said the regime has rebuffed efforts of engagement from other members of the so-called six-party process that includes North Korea.

The six-party talks, which began in 2003 to try to negotiate for Pyongyang’s denuclearization in exchange for economic aid and security guarantees, have been stalled since late 2008.

Mr. Kerry also condemned North Korea’s reported myriad human-rights violations, including the reported public executions of senior officials in what he called “grotesque” displays.

South Korea’s intelligence officials said last week that North Korea’s dictator had recently executed its defense minister by antiaircraft fire for treason. North Korea hasn’t acknowledged the execution took place.

Why the GOP Can't Get No Satisfaction // Politico // Jim Messina - May 17, 2015

One of the savviest political observers I’ve come across is Mick Jagger. I was invited to a dinner that included the legendary rocker in London before the British election (I took about 9,000 selfies), when I discovered that Mick has been a bit of a political junkie his whole life. While he’s on tour he has a lot of down time, which he spends reading, he explained to me, and I learned that he’s become a master observer not only of UK politics but of the American political scene as well (although he's not an activist and doesn't take sides). “You’re going to win,” Mick told me at dinner, despite some polls showing that my client, Prime Minister David Cameron, was still trailing in the race. “Why do you think so?” I asked. Mick replied that while he wasn't supporting any candidate himself, “the average guy thinks Cameron makes tough decisions and things are getting a bit better. They won’t change from that." The opposition, Jagger explained, was percieved as a retreat to the past.

Mick was right, of course. No matter where you go, successful election campaigns are always about the future, not the past. Ed Miliband was an old-style Labour leader, unlike Tony Blair, and he paid dearly for that on Election Day. Mick’s advice, in fact, reminds of something another rather savvy political observer, Bill Clinton, told me in 2011, as we were preparing President Barack Obama’s re-election campaign: "All national elections are always a referendum on the future, and the candidate that can grasp that mantle wins." In all major elections after the Great Recession, the candidate who provided the clearest economic vision looking ahead prevailed. President Obama won two elections on that exact premise.

In the United Kingdom’s general election, Prime Minister Cameron won on a vision of a dynamic, competitive Britain as a land of future opportunity for working families. Miliband was promising them only a return to the past: 1970s-style rent control, re-nationalization of some services, and energy price controls were, bizarrely, the main policy initiatives highlighted by Labour.

The same thing will be true of future presidential contests in the United States. There are huge political differences between the UK and U.S., but there are some important common lessons. Especially when you've been losing in recent elections, you've got to be able to redefine and rebrand your party for the future. Tony Blair did that for Labour in the UK. Ronald Reagan did it for the Republicans in 1980. Bill Clinton did it for us in 1992. So far, during the 2016 cycle, Republican presidential candidates seem dedicated to defending old policies across the spectrum from going back to pre-crisis rules for Wall Street to attacking the science of climate change to constantly focusing on restricting women's health care decisions.

If the message the GOP takes away from Cameron's win is mainly about the renewed power of right, they will fail in 2016, I believe. The truth is that British politics is skewed much further left than ours. Cameron personally led the fight to legalize gay marriage, made addressing climate change a top priority, and defended generous British humanitarian aid worldwide even as he was attacked for it. During the campaign, his manifesto called for a dramatic expansion of child care for working families, new apprenticeships for young people and eliminating taxes on workers at the minimum wage. Much of his agenda aligns very well with the modern Democratic Party platform.

The message of that election for us in the United States is less that Hillary Clinton needs to stay in the center than it is that Republicans need to move beyond their base. One reason Miliband failed is because, in British parliamentary politics, the perception is you only need to win over that base and little more. Miliband's people were privately saying he only needed to get to 35 percent. But in American politics you need the center—and a majority.

So how did a Democratic consultant in the United States come to be working for the Conservative party in Britain? I first got to know Prime Minister Cameron when I was White House Deputy Chief of Staff in 2010, and he had just won the 2010 election. After President Obama's re-election in 2012 both the Conservatives and the Labour Party sent teams to Washington and Chicago to do research on lessons-learned, and I spent time with the Cameron team. I also had a long talk with Tony Blair, the former Labour prime minister.

Then, after I finished winding down President Obama's re-election campaign, the Prime Minister called to ask if I could come to see him in London. My wife and I had dinner with him and his wife and we had a long talk about the issues, when I realized how close in thinking we were. That really struck a chord for me. I spent a lot of time studying both Miliband and Cameron. In the end I thought Cameron was the better leader, as well as being a proven, strong ally for the United States.

The British people, clearly, agreed. Cameron's ability to secure an outright majority in Parliament is an historic achievement. Indeed, when we began advising the prime minister, he trailed Miliband by seven percent, 38-31, with the Liberal Democrats at about 10 percent. Future rising star parties United Kingdom Independence Party (UKIP) and the Scottish National Party (SNP) had not yet begun taking serious votes off of both parties, which would later reshape the race and politics in Britain.

In Europe and the United States, the strongest leaders have faced an incredibly difficult combination of rising debt and stubborn unemployment that mandated a number of unenviable choices since 2008. Nine major European countries dumped their leaders, including those in France, Italy, and Spain. The difference between the leaders who were re-elected and those who were defeated had much to do with their ability to not just explain their difficult past choices but to articulate a future that expands opportunity. In Cameron's case it was an emphasis on concrete, believable next steps to continue the path of economic growth like eliminating taxes on most workers at or near the minimum wage, expanded apprenticeships, and dramatically expanded childcare for working parents.

Jeb Bush's brotherly bind // WaPo // E.J. Dionne Jr. – May 17, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Am I am the only person outside the Bush family who has a smidgen of empathy for Jeb Bush's roller-coaster ride in trying to answer a straightforward question: Was going to war in Iraq the right thing to do?

It's hard to go much beyond "smidgen" because it remains astonishing that Bush hadn't worked out long in advance how he'd grapple with an inevitable query about the invasion his brother launched. Jeb's responses over four days were, as The Post's Philip Rucker and Ed O'Keefe wrote, "wavering, uncertain and incongruous."

E.J. Dionne writes about politics in a twice-weekly column and on the PostPartisan blog. He is also a senior fellow in Governance Studies at the Brookings Institution, a government professor at Georgetown University and a frequent commentator on politics for National Public Radio, ABC's "This Week" and NBC's "Meet the Press." View Archive

The saga began when Fox News's Megyn Kelly asked Bush if, knowing all we know now, he would have gone to war. "I would have, and so would have Hillary Clinton, just to remind everybody," Bush replied. "And so would have almost everybody that was confronted with the intelligence they got."

Bang! The political world, including conservatives who had strongly supported George W.'s foreign policy, came down on him hard. After going this way and that, Jeb admitted defeat on Thursday. He mixed the first-person singular and plural with the second person in, finally, responding to Kelly's original question. "Knowing what we know now, what would you have done? I would have not engaged. I would not have gone into Iraq."

So why have any sympathy for him at all? The main reason is very old-fashioned: His apparent reluctance to cast his own brother into the darkness. In justifying his initial answer, Bush later used his own reframing of Kelly's words as an excuse, explaining he hadn't understood the "know now" part. But it's just as possible that he knew perfectly well what Kelly had asked — Jeb Bush is not stupid — and hoped he could get away with answering a different question to avoid being disloyal to George W.

Loyalty is a virtue in rather short supply in our culture, so I admire it when I see it. Of course it can be misplaced. There are times when other virtues should trump it. But loyalty does matter, and I have some respect for Jeb for trying to stay true to his family ties over four utterly miserable days.

Still, there are more important issues here than family. Bush's agony isn't over because Iraq raises profound questions not only for him but also for all of his GOP opponents. If Bush's initial answer about the war was wrong and his most recent answer was right, this means that opponents of the war were also right. They included a young Illinois state senator, Barack Obama, who predicted in 2002 that "even a successful war against Iraq will require a U.S. occupation of undetermined length, at undetermined cost, with undetermined consequences."

Many of the war's staunchest supporters understand that they can never concede that Obama was right because doing so would undermine their ongoing defense of a hyperinterventionist foreign policy. That's why some of them remain unrepentant. "I believed in it then," former vice president Dick Cheney said of the war to Politico's Mike Allen last July. "I look back on it now, it was absolutely the right thing to do."

Bill Kristol, one of the war's leading promoters, told CNN last June: "I'm not apologizing for something that I think was not wrong. I think going to war to remove Saddam was the right thing to do and necessary and just thing to do." Donald Rumsfeld, George W.'s first secretary of defense, said that it would have been "immoral" not to go to Iraq.

But other hawks would rather see the was-the-Iraq-War-right question magically disappear because they know it's a no-win for them. Most Americans now think the war was ill-advised. Why remind them that most of the same people who are super hawks now brought them an adventure they deeply regret? Thus did the Wall Street Journal editorial page on Friday come out firmly and unequivocally in favor of — evasion. "The right answer to the question is that it's not a useful or instructive one to answer, because statesmanship, like life, is not conducted in hindsight."

Sorry, but inquiring minds will want all the candidates to offer straight answers. This means that Bush's Republican opponents will have to do more than trash his botched dodging. Bush at least had the excuse that he didn't want to speak ill of his brother. The rest of them still need to explain how their own views of the past relate to where they'll take us in the future.

Six dangerous issues in the 2016 GOP White House race // The Hill // Peter Schroeder - May 17, 2015

Republican contenders for the White House are under pressure to toe the party line on a number of issues as they battle for the nomination.

Primary voters will demand to know where the presidential hopefuls stand on a slew of hot-button issues, including immigration, taxes and climate change.

Several of the candidates have already stumbled with their answers, highlighting the intense scrutiny they will be under in the critical early voting states of Iowa and New Hampshire.

Here are some of the biggest political landmines ahead for the Republican field.

IMMIGRATION

Immigration is one of the thorniest issues for the Republican Party.

In the GOP primary, the candidates are fighting for the support of mostly conservative voters, who are generally opposed to anything they view as granting "amnesty" to undocumented people.

But the eventual Republican nominee will need to make gains with Hispanic voters in the general election to win the White House, but that segment of the electorate has shifted decisively toward Democrats in recent years.

Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.), who helped write the Senate's 2013 immigration reform bill, and former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush have cast themselves as candidates who can appeal to Hispanics and win the general election.

But to become their party's nominee, both will have to overcome distrust on immigration from the party's base.

Rubio has backed away from the reform legislation he helped write, telling a conservative crowd in February that border security must come first.

Other Republican candidates, such as Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker and former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, have come out against a pathway to citizenship for undocumented immigrants.

Bush has mostly stuck to his guns on granting illegal immigrants a path to citizenship, while emphasizing to conservatives their common ground on border security and fighting Obama's executive actions.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Other candidates in the 2016 race, such as Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas), are likely to hammer Rubio and Bush as backing “amnesty.”

COMMON CORE

The federal education standards known as Common Core are deeply unpopular in the GOP, with polls show that Republican voters oppose them by a 3 to 1 margin.

The education standards have provided a ripe target for Republican candidates to take swings at a top-down prescription from the federal government.

Sen. Rand Paul (Ky.) and Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal (R) have assailed the education protocol, with Paul’s PAC referring to it as “anti-American propaganda.”

Walker has said he wants to eliminate the requirement, and Gov. Chris Christie has created a commission to review its place in New Jersey.

Standing virtually alone in support of Common Core is Bush, who argues states have plenty of say in how the standards are carried out.

That stance could prove to be a real liability in Iowa. A February Des Moines Register poll found that while 56 percent of Iowans back the standards, just 34 percent of Iowa Republicans do.

THE IRAQ WAR

President George W. Bush’s controversial tenure in the White House looms large over the current field, and candidates have been rushing to distance themselves from his Iraq War.

It’s been hard to find a prominent Republican who now supports the 2002 invasion, which remains deeply unpopular with the public. Rubio, New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie and Cruz have all said that in hindsight, going to war was a mistake, as has Sen. Rand Paul (Ky.), a longtime critic of that military action.

The political peril of Iraq is especially acute for Jeb Bush, who struggled much of the past week to say whether he would have also authorized the military action. After vacillating on the issue for several days, Bush finally came out against his brother’s decision on Thursday.

But his confusing and dismissive responses to the question over several days gave his rivals an opening, with Paul arguing his responses made clear Jeb would be “George Bush 3.”

GAY MARRIAGE

Opposition to same-sex marriage used to be a reliable position for any Republican presidential candidate, but at a time of growing support for such unions, the GOP primary field has splintered.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Most Republican candidates have answered affirmatively when asked if they would attend a gay wedding. Walker said he actually has done so for a family member.

But social conservatives remain staunchly opposed to gay marriage, and some of the contenders are taking a hard line.

Former Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.), Cruz and Jindal have fiercely opposed same-sex unions, and back legislative efforts to block them.

Others, like Paul, Rubio and Christie, have said the matter should be left up to the states. Rubio drew headlines in April when he said he did not believe sexual orientation was a choice, even as he said same-sex marriage is not a right.

The challenge of the issue was apparent when Ben Carson, the former neurosurgeon now running for the White House, apologized after saying that same-sex relationships in prison prove sexual orientation is a choice.

TAXES

Any Republican with an eye towards the White House is going to be talking taxes, which has long been one of the biggest dividing lines with the Democratic Party.

While all of the GOPers are eager to promote fiscal responsibility and tax cuts, there is an emerging split among the candidates on how far they are willing to go.

Some of the 2016 hopefuls have issued dramatic plans to slash taxes, as they look to stand out in the crowded field.

Cruz, Paul and Carson have called for the outright elimination of the Internal Revenue Service, and some are advocating a dramatic overhaul of the tax code, pushing for a single flat tax rate for all Americans.

Rubio has taken a different tack, proposing a tax plan in March alongside Sen. Mike Lee (R-Utah) that would moderately trim the top rates for individuals and businesses, while eliminating some deductions. But that proposal has opened him up to conservative criticism, as some on the right call it insufficient.

But Rubio is lockstep with nearly every other GOP candidate in signing Grover Norquist's taxpayer pledge, vowing to oppose any and all tax increases while in office. The only Republican candidate thus far to refuse the pledge is Bush.

CLIMATE CHANGE

While none of the Republican contenders are vowing to tackle climate change if elected president, they are split on whether human activity is driving it.

Most Republican voters say it would be unacceptable for their candidate to believe in man-made climate change, let alone pursue policies to address it.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Some of the candidates, including Paul and Bush, have adopted an agnostic view, saying the jury is still out on how much the climate is changing, and if so, what role humans play in it.

Others, such as Cruz and Santorum, have depicted climate change as a hoax by the left to impose new environmental restrictions on the business community.

When the Senate considered legislation on the Keystone XL pipeline, Cruz, Rubio and Paul all voted for an amendment stating that climate change was real.

Paul was the only 2016 contender to support a separate amendment that stated human beings contribute to climate change.

Iowa Democrats flee Hillary Clinton over GMO support, Monsanto ties // WaPo // S.A. Miller - May 17, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton's ties to agribusiness giant Monsanto, and her advocacy for the industry's genetically modified crops, have environmentalists in Iowa calling her "Bride of Frankenfood" — putting yet another wrinkle in her presidential campaign's courtship of liberal activists who are crucial to winning the state's Democratic caucuses.

The backlash against Mrs. Clinton for her support of genetically modified organisms (GMO), which dominate the corn and soybean crops at the heart of Iowa's economy, manifested itself at a recent meeting of the Tri-County Democrats, where members gauged support for the former secretary of state.

A large faction of women voiced strong support for Mrs. Clinton's candidacy until the GMO issue came up, prompting them to switch allegiances to Sen. Bernard Sanders of Vermont, a liberal stalwart challenging her for the Democratic nomination.

"I was surprised, because these women were really pushing for Hillary until they found out about the Monsanto connection, and then they dropped her like a hot potato," said James Berge, Democratic Party chairman for Worth County, Iowa.

"It's quite a big issue," he said. "There's people who are just wild about all the use of GMOs."

The issue gives liberal voters another reason to be skeptical of Mrs. Clinton, whom they already distrust because of her cozy relationship with Wall Street and the centrist philosophy that she and her husband, former President Bill Clinton, long embraced.

Mrs. Clinton likely will keep the GMO debate on a back burner when she makes her second swing through Iowa this week. She has scheduled stops Monday and Tuesday to rally grass-roots support and discuss ideas to expand small businesses in the state.

She enjoys a massive advantage in the polls in Iowa, leading Mr. Sanders 60 percent to 15 percent in a recent Quinnipiac University survey. While not an overt threat to her, Mr. Sanders has inched up in the polls since he entered the race April 30, and his liberal agenda is popular with the party activists.

“Iowa is a big agricultural state, but we’ve got to realize some of the food that we are producing in this country is going to cause great health effects down the road, and then it’s probably going to be too late to try to fix it,” said Mr. Berge. “You can’t even wash this pesticide off, because it is in the plants themselves, and you are digesting it, and it goes into your body. It’s not a good thing.”

GMOs include seeds engineered in a laboratory to have certain traits, such as resistance to such herbicides as Monsanto’s widely used Roundup. Most of the corn and soybeans in the U.S. are genetically modified. Much of it goes into animal feed, but it also is in popular processed food ingredients like high fructose corn syrup and soybean oil.

Iowa leads the country in the production of corn and ranks among the top producers of soybeans.

Agribusiness interests claim that GMO crops are more resistant to pests, drought and cold weather, increasing yields and limiting the use of pesticides.

But environmentalists argue that genetically modified food is unhealthy and promotes excessive use of pesticides.

A new scientific study bolstered environmentalists’ concerns by finding the herbicide Roundup could be linked to a range of health problems and diseases, including Parkinson’s, infertility and cancers. The study published last month in the scientific journal Entropy also reported evidence that residue of glyphosate, a chief ingredient in the weed killer, has been found in food.

In the GMO debate, Mrs. Clinton has consistently sided with the chemical companies.

Her top campaign operative in Iowa is former Monsanto lobbyist Jerry Crawford, who’s also a veteran of Iowa politics and Clinton campaigns.

Her history of backing GMO dates back to her early days in Arkansas as a lawyer with the Rose Law Firm, which represented Monsanto and other agribusiness leaders.

Just last year, Mrs. Clinton gave a paid speech at a biotech industry conference in San Diego, where she championed GMOs and advised the executives and investors to give their products an image makeover.

“‘Genetically modified’ sounds Frankensteinish. ‘Drought-resistant’ sounds like something you’d want,” she said. “Be more careful so you don’t raise that red flag immediately.”

Big ag also has been a big donor to the Clinton Foundation, the family charity at the center of pay-to-play accusations involving foreign donors while Mrs. Clinton ran the State Department.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Monsanto gave the foundation between $501,250 and $1 million. Dow Chemical Company, which is among the top GMO players, gave between $1 million and $5 million, according to financial disclosures by the Clinton Foundation.

Mrs. Clinton's support for Monsanto and genetically modified food was one of the factors that contributed to her embarrassing third-place finish in the 2008 Iowa caucuses, said Laura Hubka, vice chair of the Tri-County Democrats, a club in Howard, Mitchell and Worth counties along the state's norther border with Minnesota.

"We are very environmentally active," said Ms. Hubka. "It would be great to hear her come out and speak against Monsanto and what it has done to our farmers as far as our corn production now. There's a lot of things Monsanto has done that [have] made us unhappy."

Ms. Hubka said that Mrs. Clinton could make amends by getting out in front of the GMO issue.

"It seems like she is out in front of several issues [like] the immigration issue, [and] she's been out in front of working on police issues that have come up recently," said Ms. Hubka. "We are hoping to see her make a turn also against Monsanto. That would be fantastic for us."

Mark Shelley, chairman of the political science department at Iowa State University, said that Mrs. Clinton likely would be able to weather opposition from environmentalists at the caucuses because farming is a pocketbook issue for most Iowans.

"So much of Iowa's economy is connected to agriculture directly, and to closely related industries such as farm implement manufacturing, seed companies and food processing, that agribusiness interests are often seen as having outsize influence on the state's political climate," he said.

"It is important to note, though, that Democratic caucuses tend to attract people with more active interests in issues, which in that party translates to caucus attenders who are generally more progressive-leaning than the party as a whole," Mr. Shelley said

Iran Erupts: U.S. Must Pursue Engagement, Human Rights and Reject Radical Neocons

Washington, D.C. - Iran erupted this weekend following claims from the regime that President Ahmadinejad had been overwhelming reelected. The announcement was met with incredulity given numerous irregularities. Supporters of the main opposition candidate, former Prime Minister Mir Hussein Moussavi, quickly took to the streets in protest. The regime has cracked down brutally, detained many opposition leaders, placed Moussavi under watch, evicted and detained foreign journalists, and attempted to block protestors ability to communicate and organize by blocking text messaging and internet access. Americans are justifiably sympathetic to the Iranian demonstrators. But an over the top response from Washington would only make the situation worse, as it would serve to further the regime's line that these demonstrations are illegitimate-American backed efforts to interfere in Iran. We must not give Ahmedinejad the chance to claim that his fight is with Washington, and not with his own citizens. Iranian human rights advocates have asked the U.S. to "keep its distance," a request American conservatives seem eager to ignore as they take to the airwaves calling for aggressive and direct American support for the demonstrators. Additionally, there are not many levers available to the United States - and those continuing to advocate military action have seemingly not learned that exporting democracy through the barrel of a gun is a disastrous approach.

Instead, the Obama administration should continue to pursue a responsible course that refrains from legitimizing the results, expresses support for the human rights of Iran's opposition, as well as ensures that the U.S. is not strengthening the regime by being seen as directly meddling. Going forward, the Obama administration must continue its policy of attempting to engage Iran and its people. Past U.S. policy of isolating and threatening Iran completely failed in both weakening Iran and stopping its nuclear program - and only served to strengthen hardliners. As is clearly apparent, the regime feels highly threatened by the prospect of greater openness and engagement with the west. Offering the prospect for greater interaction - far from supporting the regime as conservative critics suggest -would only strengthen those calling for dialogue and - if greater interaction were to occur - would serve to further threaten the regime's conservative hardliners.

The Obama administration - and Americans across the political spectrum -- can best support Iranian human rights by letting the Iranian people take the lead. Spencer Ackerman reports on the developing U.S. response to the unrest in Iran following elections which were widely criticized as fraudulent: "Administration officials, on and off the record, said that President Obama would offer support for human rights in Iran generally and would not back away from his diplomatic outreach to the longtime U.S. adversary, regardless of the ultimate outcome of the election." This policy flows from a concern that aggressive U.S. interference would undermine the Iranian opposition. According to the Independent, a senior U.S. official emphasized that "it was important to have a policy toward Iran that advanced the administration's desire for liberalization and human rights in Iran, not one that merely vented American outrage at Ahmadinejad." The Obama administration has also expressed concern over the legitimacy of the Iranian elections. Press Secretary Robert Gibbs raised the "reports of irregularities," during a White House press conference, while Vice President Joe Biden expressed "real doubt" about the results, and called for a "thorough review of the whole process." Conservatives like Mitt Romney have recklessly called for the Obama administration to declare the elections a "fraud," but human rights groups and other Iranian voices have argued that overt interference would bolster the regime. Hadi Ghaemi, a New York-based spokesman for the International Campaign for Human Rights in Iran, remarked to the Independent: "I think it's wise for the U.S. government to keep its distance." According to the Independent's interview with Ghaemi, "any expression of political support for the protesters would only 'instigate the cry that the reformers are somehow driven and directed by the United States, whether under [former President George W. Bush] or under Obama, and there's no reason to give that unfounded allegation' any chance to spread." Iran expert and founder of the National Iranian American Council Trita Parsi echoed Ghaemi, saying ""If the administration is saying things or doing things before Moussavi and the opposition figures out what the plan is, then that's a real problem, because then it seems like it's between Ahmadinejad and the west and not Ahmadinejad and the opposition. So the administration is doing exactly the right thing." [Washington Independent, 6/15/09 . Robert Gibbs, 6/14/09 . Mitt Romney, 6/14/09 . Vice President Joe Biden, 6/14/09]

Conservatives display stunning hypocrisy on Iran, using elections to push their own extreme agenda. A week ago, conservatives insisted nothing of consequence was happening in Iran. In an editorial on Friday, the Washington Times wrote: "It doesn't really matter who wins today's presidential election in Iran. No matter the outcome, Tehran's foreign policy will not change and the nation's people will remain oppressed." Former Bush administration official Elliot Abrams dismissed the reformist movement, saying, "[t]here is no chance for voters to register their opposition to the theocratic system or tell the ayatollahs to go back to the mosques." These analyses ignored Iranians' democratic impulses, and particularly the opposition's explicit calls for engagement with the US. the elections were "widely seen here (Iran) as a referendum on the hard-line policies of Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad," according to the New York Times, and in an interview before the election, Moussavi remarked that the idea of engagement, advanced by the Obama administration, has meant that the "the taboo in this country (Iran) about talking to America has been broken." This weekend, Mitt Romney continued to insist that "the comments by the president last week that there was a robust debate going on in Iran was obviously entirely wrong-headed." But other conservatives switched to a new political ploy - discovering the Iranian people's interest in democracy and insisting that the US interfere to the detriment of other interests. Bill Kristol went on Fox News Sunday saying that, "I do want to send money. And I want to tell the Iranians who are on the fence and who do want trade with Europe and do want warmer relations with the U.S., "Look, you've got now to back off or else you don't get anything you want." [Mitt Romney, 6/14/09 .. Washington Times, 6/12/09 . Elliot Abrams, NY Times, 6/12/09 . NY Times, 6/12/09 . Al-Jazeera English, 6/11/09 . Bill Kristol, 6/14/09]

The election may change a great deal in Iran - or it may not - but it does not alter the underlying strategic factors which make prospect of engagement with Iran the best policy for America's interests. Diplomatic engagement with Iran is the right path in pursuing America's interests, regardless of the outcome of the election and resulting demonstrations. As the vice-president said on Meet the Press yesterday, "[l]ook, talks with Iran are not a reward for good behavior. They're only a consequence if the president makes the judgment it's in the best interest of the United States of America, our national security interests, to talk with the Iranian regime. Our interests are the same before the election as after the election, and that is we want them to cease and desist from seeking a nuclear weapon and having one in its possession, and secondly to stop supporting terror... It's not being done with a single person." Suzanne Maloney of the Brookings Institution goes on to say, "[t]he United States must seek out opportunities for resolving the increasingly urgent impasse over Iran's nuclear program and addressing the broader array of concerns about Iranian policy. The elections have not changed the fact that negotiations represent the best of a range of unappealing options available to Washington. However, as a result of the increasingly arbitrary actions by Iran's leadership, the American diplomatic approach has become more complicated and a successful resolution of the three-decade long estrangement becomes unfortunately less likely." But as the New York Times concludes in an editorial this morning, "[t]he only choice is negotiations backed by credible incentives and tough sanctions. Even if the mullahs had allowed Mr. Moussavi to win, that would still be true." A 2007 report from the Center for American Progress recommends engagement as an effort to weaken the radical elements of the Iranian government. It says, "We should complement... containment efforts with sufficient diplomatic openings to engage pragmatic members of Iran's ruling elite and appeal to the broad masses of the Iranian public in order to isolate and weaken the radical revolutionary elements represented by President Mohammed Ahmadinejad... By rejecting the obviously flawed options, however, and then conducting a sober appraisal of the possible, we are left with our best available option: decisive diplomacy to contain and engage Iran." [Joseph Biden, Meet the Press, 6/14/09 . Suzanne Maloney, 6/14/09 . NY Times, 6/15/09 . American Progress, 2007]

Subject: Iran statement

HRC has signed off on the statement below and asks if she should tweet as well. Anyone have any concerns?

The understanding that the major world powers have reached with Iran is an important step toward a comprehensive agreement that would prevent Iran from getting a nuclear weapon and strengthen the security of the United States, Israel, and the region. President Obama and Secretary Kerry have been persistent and determined in pursuit of this goal, building on a decade of bipartisan pressure and diplomacy. Getting the rest of the way to a final deal by June won't be easy, but it is absolutely crucial. I know well that the devil is always in the details in this kind of negotiation. So I strongly support President Obama and Secretary Kerry's efforts between now and June to reach a final deal that verifiably cuts off all of Iran's paths to a nuclear weapon, imposes an intrusive inspection program with no sites off limits, extends breakout time, and spells out clear and overwhelming consequences for violations. The onus is on Iran and the bar must be set high. It is also vital that our efforts to deny Iran a nuclear weapon be part of a comprehensive strategy to check its regional ambitions, defend our allies and partners, and reinforce American leadership in the Middle East. There is much to do and much more to say in the months ahead, but for now diplomacy deserves a chance to succeed.

Disability Will Never Be Immoral

Prenatal genetic testing can be a valuable tool, but it provides strikingly limited data. Events of this summer, including the abandonment of Baby Gammy and shockingly intolerant comments from Richard Dawkins, speak to the risk of conflating one type of information with a broader reality.

Rough Transcript

HOST: let's go straight to senator bernie sanders. senator, good morning. you saw those new poll numbers, is hillary clinton's campaign in trouble?

BERNIE SANDERS: well, i don't know if her campaign is trouble, but our campaign is doing great. it's not just in iowa, it's in new hampshire, i think people are sfonding to our message that something is wrong when the middle class of this country continues to disappear, people are working longer hours for low wages, almost all of the new wealth and income is going to the top 1%, that's not the type of country, not the type of economy that the american people want or deserve and i think they're prepared to support somebody who's going to to take on the billionaire class and make an economy work for ordinary people not just for the people on top.

HOST: senator sanders, hillary clinton has lost about a third of her supporters since may, but the polls don't show those supporters, a significant number, are not heading your way, why not, given what you said?

BERNIE SANDERS: well, the poll that i saw say there was massive enthusiasm for the message that we're delivering and the vast majority of feel who are voting for me in that iowa poll, i'm not necessarily anti-hillary clinton, they're pro-bernie sanders. and they want a candidate who's not dependent upon super pacs. a candidate help the united states leave the world in combatting climate change, make college affordable to all people. i have to tell you, martha, i think the gains weeeeeing and the enthusiasm and the huge crowds that we are seeing, this is not anti-hillary clinton, this is pro-bernie sanders and pro a message that says, enough is enough, this country and our government belong to all of us.

HOST: senator sanders, this morning, again, we know you have been voicing great concern about the middle class, the cost of college, climate change and yet there are two issues that are entirely missing from your campaign website, and those are issues of national security and foreign policy. don't you feel these are issues that a president should be very concerned about?

BERNIE SANDERS: absolutely, martha, and you know, in all fairness, we have been in this race for 3 1/2 months and we have been focusing quite correctly, as you have indicated, on the economy on the collapse of the american middle class on massive income and wealth inequality. you're absolutely right. foreign policy is a huge issue. we'll spend more time on that. you're looking at a senator and a former congressman and as a congressman i voted against the war in iraq, which i think will go down in history as one of the worst foreign -- foreign policy blunders that we have ever seen leading to the e nor us now destabilization of that region right now. the issue of foreign policy, how we bring the world together, our allies together, not to do it alone to take on isis, to deal with the other threats and problems --

HOST: senator sanders, you brought up the iraq war. you also voted against the first gulf war in 1991. when saddam hussein had invaded kuwait. you did not support air attacks after chemical attacks in syria, you did support the initial invasion into afghanistan, so, can you tell me what your criteria is for the use of force sf.

BERNIE SANDERS: yes, good question, a fair question, look, i think historically, in too many instances, the united states has gone to war often unilaterally when we should have, i think my vote against the first war in the gulf region was the right vote, i think we could have gotten saddam hussein out of kuwait that did not require a war.

HOST: even though he had invaded kuwait?

BERNIE SANDERS: but, the point was, you had the whole world united against him, martha, do we need to go to war in every instances? look, i'm supporting president obama's effort to make certain that iron does not get a nuclear weapon. i get very nervous about my republican friends who keep implying that's the only way we could do that is through war. war is the last resort not the first resort. there are times when you have to use force, no question about it.

HOST: is that we're only attacked? if you look at your record, you supported the invasion into afghanistan after we were attacked? is that the only time you would support it?

BERNIE SANDERS: not at all. not at all. i think using our military is an option, obviously, that we will always have under certain circumstances. but it's the last option. i applaud the president for trying to make certain that we stop iran from getting a nuclear weapon but we do it in a way that does not require war. the second point that i would make, the united states can't do it alone. in the middle east, saudi arabia has the third a largest military budget in the entire world. they're going to have to get in and take on isis as well as other countries in that region. the united states should be supportive. working with other countries. the united states can't always be the only country involved in these wars.

HOST: let me go back to the iran agreement, can you imagine iran or russia signing some sort of agreement in the future, giving your record on your reluctance to use force, because there is always that threat of force, they may look at you and say, bernie sanders wouldn't do anything about this.

BERNIE SANDERS: i think they would be making a mistake. the united states should have the strongest military in the world. we should be working with other countries in coalition. when people threaten the united states or our allies or commit genocide, the united states, with other countries, should be prepared to act militarily. but i think when we look at our recent history, again, especially the war in iraq, i think history will record that as a terrible mistake which has led to massive destabilization and many other problems. so, yes, there are times when you have to use military force, no question about it. i'm prepared to do that.

HOST: would you do away with the drone program? because you have had clearly problems with that. you didn't vote for the cia director because of the drone program.

BERNIE SANDERS: martha, what you can argue is that there are times and places where drone attacks have been effective. there are times and places where they have been absolutely countereffective. and and have caused more problems than solved. then end result in the people become anti-american, so, i think we have to use drones very, very selectively and effectively.

HOST: okay, thank you very much, senator sanders.

Skimm for September 11th

Today is the 14th anniversary of the 9/11 attacks. Our thoughts are with all those affected by the tragic events of that day.

THINGS MAKING A JUDGMENT CALL

THE SENATE

THE STORY

Yesterday, Senate Dems made sure the Iran nuclear deal is here to stay .

EXPLAIN.

Reminder: the deal limits Iran's nuclear capabilities in exchange for lifting sanctions on the country. Most Dems think a deal's better than no deal. But the GOP thinks it doesn't go far enough in preventing Iran from building a nuke…and that there should be no deal, period. So the GOP wrote up a resolution to kill it. That resolution went to a vote yesterday, and Senate Dems made sure it did not pass go.

WHAT DOES THIS MEAN?

That President Obama won't have to take out his veto stamp, since the GOP resolution is now off the table. The nuclear deal will be formally adopted next month. End. Scene.

:heSKIMM

This is a big policy win for President Obama that came with big-time drama. But the GOP definitely isn't done talking about it, especially ahead of 2016.

PRESIDENT OBAMA

THE STORY

Yesterday, President Obama raised his hand and said 'here to help' with the EU's migrant and refugee crisis.

10 SECONDS. REMIND ME.

In recent years, places like the Mideast and Africa have been in shambles. Cue hundreds of thousands of people risking their lives to get to a better place...like the EU. Lately, the crisis has gone from bad to worse. Border countries like Greece and Italy are overwhelmed by the number of people crossing, and the lack of resources to deal with it. This week, the EU announced it wants to require member countries to accept refugees.

WHAT ABOUT THE US?

Captain America has sent billions of aid dollars. But a lot of people think that's not enough. So yesterday, the US said it's also taking in 10,000 Syrian refugees over the next year. That's a big step up, considering the US has only let in 1,500 Syrians in the last four years.

theSKIMM

The UN expects almost a million people to cross into the EU by next year. So while the US might want an 'A' for effort, this pledge probably won't even make a dent in the crisis.

THE *: We Skimm'd the crisis for you.

REPEAT AFTER ME...

WHAT TO SAY WHEN YOU HEAR THE NYPD APOLOGIZED FOR ARRESTING JAMES BLAKE...

Necessary. And speaking of…yesterday, almost $80 million was set aside to get rid of a backlog of rape kits in the US. Yes, there's a backlog of rape kits in the US. For years, tens of thousands of rape kits – which could go a long way to helping solve rape cases – have been sitting on the shelf. That's partly because testing the kits can be expensive. So yesterday's announcement means police departments around the country will now have the cash to do it. This comes after Detroit just finished testing its own backlog of kits. And ID'd almost 500 suspected rapists. Well done.

SKIMM THIS

WHAT TO SAY WHEN YOU'RE ASKED TO GIVE A SELF-ASSESSMENT AT WORK...

That's what the '100' emoji is for. Earlier this week, The Daily Beast reported that top US military officials are putting a sunny spin on the fight against ISIS in Syria. Intelligence analysts have been preparing reports that basically say 'things aren't looking so good.' But their bosses apparently don't like negative feedback, and have allegedly been altering those reports to say 'things are looking good.' Now, more than 50 of those analysts are calling them out. The Pentagon's inspector general is investigating.

SKIMM THIS

WHAT PEOPLE ARE WATCHING...

Arizona. Over the past two weeks, there have been at least 11 shootings on a highway in Phoenix, Arizona. But no one knows where the bullets are coming from. There's been one injury and no deaths, but it hasn't exactly made people's commutes less stressful. Arizona police are calling it "domestic terrorism" and don't have any leads about who's behind it. Comforting.

SKIMM THIS

WHAT TO SAY WHEN YOU GET CAUGHT IN THE RAIN WITHOUT AN UMBRELLA...

Can't complain. This week, a tropical storm hit Japan, causing major flooding and landslides. At least two people died and several others are missing. Houses are underwater, and stranded residents have had to be rescued by military helicopters. Tens of thousands of people were told to evacuate.

Discredited Author Ronald Kessler Has Next Anti-Clinton Gossip Book

58 minutes ago ››› MATT GERTZ

Ronald Kessler reportedly attacks Bill and Hillary Clinton with anonymously-sourced stories in his forthcoming book The First Family Detail: Secret Service Agents Reveal the Hidden Lives of Presidents, according to British tabloids and The New York Post. Critics have described Kessler's previous books as "National Enquirer-style gossip," and claims in his previous book on the Secret Service were "strongly disputed" by the agency and other subjects. Kessler was an established journalist for credible newspapers like The Washington Post decades ago but became chief Washington correspondent for the far-right outlet NewsMax in 2006. He subsequently pushed false smears of Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama and led the charge to promote Donald Trump as a presidential candidate. The First Family Detail is part of a trifecta of anti-Clinton books based on anonymous sources published this summer, along with Daniel Halper's Clinton Inc.: The Audacious Rebuilding of a Political Machine and Edward Klein's Blood Feud: The Clintons vs. the Obamas.

Kessler's Books Criticized As "Page Six" Style "Gossip" -- And That's His Intent

Wash. Post* Review: Kessler Book Features "National Enquirer-Style Gossip" That Could Endanger Presidents. National security reporter James Bamford wrote in The Washington Post that for his book In The President's Secret Service, Kessler "milked the agents for the juiciest gossip he could get and mixed it with a rambling list of their complaints." He added: "What is truly dangerous is the kind of National Enquirer-style gossip in Kessler's book. In the future, without 'trust and confidence' in their agents, presidents will want to keep them at a distance, out of spying range -- and out of safety range, when split seconds may count. And with President Obama, such concerns may be especially acute." [The Washington Post, 8/23/09]

New York Times* Reviewer: Kessler Book Is "Speculation-Filled." New York Times critic Michiko Kakutani called Kessler's Joseph P. Kennedy book The Sins of the Father a "meanspirited, speculation-filled biography ... which purveyed a determinedly poisonous portrait of the man." [The New York Times, 11/29/12]

Globe and Mail* Review: Kessler "Relies Too Heavily On Speculation, Gossip, Innuendo And Secondary Sources." Globe and Mail editorial board member Andrew Cohen wrote of The Sins Of The Father:

> For what is called a major book, the research is sometimes suspect. The description of Kennedy's affair with [Gloria] Swanson, for example, sounds much like her own account. Kessler relies too heavily on speculation, gossip, innuendo and secondary sources. He quotes the nephew of Francis Cardinal Spellman saying that Joe boasted to him that he had put JFK on the cover of Time in 1957 for $75,000 (U.S.). That's enough for Kessler. Like a reporter on deadline, he goes with what he has, even when it isn't enough.
> Instead of dirtying the dustbin, Kessler might have advanced the story. [The Globe and Mail, 5/11/96, via Nexis]

Wash. Post* Review: "Hey, Sex Sells, Maybe These Would Be Page Six Bites On A Slow Day." Vanity Fair special correspondent Bryan Burrough wrote at the Washington Post of Kessler's The Secrets of the FBI:

> Revelations? Okay. There's a nice section on what Kessler bills as the untold story of how the Russian spy Robert Hanssen was caught; that probably qualifies. More representative, though, is a chapter called "Threesomes" that recapitulates the 1970s-era Elizabeth Ray scandal -- the news here is Capitol Hill's purported appetite for the ménage àtrois -- and tosses in a quarter-century-old tale about an unnamed young lady who supposedly had sex with groups of men in the upper reaches of the Dirksen Senate Office Building. "Attic Girl," Kessler says she was "affectionately" named. Then it's on to a 1980s-era tale of a CIA mole who frequented sex clubs. Not too sure what any of this has to do with, you know, the FBI -- they made the arrests, I guess -- but hey, sex sells. Maybe these would be Page Six bites on a slow day. [The Washington Post, 8/25/11]

Even Kessler's Publisher Hyped The "Page Six Tidbits" In His Books. As Burroughs noted, publicity materials for The Secrets of the FBI promised it would be "filled with revelations about the Bureau and Page Six tidbits, just like those that made In the President's Secret Service so successful." [Crown Publishing Group catalog, Summer 2011]

Claims In Kessler's Previous Secret Service Book Were "Strongly Disputed"

Secret Service "Strongly Disputed" Kessler Claim That They Are "Totally Overloaded." In a 2009 report on Kessler's book, CNN's Brian Todd reported that the Secret Service "strongly disputed" one of Kessler's claims:

> RON KESSLER, AUTHOR, IN THE PRESIDENT'S SECRET SERVICE: The fact is that they're -- the Secret Service is totally overloaded. They have so many extra duties that they're performing and the number of agents has not really increased.
> TODD: Contacted by CNN, a Secret Service spokesman strongly disputed those assessments, saying the agency is not overstretched and that its ranks have increased. The spokesman says last year, while agents protected several candidates during the longest and most expensive campaign in American history, the Secret Service also had its biggest haul ever of financial assets seized from criminals -- $141 million. [CNN, The Situation Room, 10/24/09]

Secret Service Director Debunked Kessler's Claim Of A 400 Percent Increase In Threats Under Obama. In his previous Secret Service book, Kessler reported that the Service had seen a 400 percent increase in threats under President Obama compared to President Bush. Kessler's statistic circulated widely. But in a congressional hearing, Secret Service Director Mark Sullivan said the claim was false, stating that the threats were "the same level as it has been [against] the last two presidents." [PolitiFact, 3/18/13]

Mary Cheney Told Kessler The Book's Stories About Her Were False. The New York Post reported of Kessler's 2009 book on the agency, In the President's Secret Service:

> According to "In the President's Secret Service" by Ronald Kessler, when Mary demanded the Service shuttle her friends out to restaurants, the agent in charge objected and she had him removed from her detail. The former veep's daughter also allegedly complained about the Secret Service vehicle assigned to her. "She saw that her sister [Elizabeth] had a brand-new Suburban," an agent who was on her detail tells the author. "Mary had an older vehicle. She was like, why can't I have one? Next thing you know, within a day or two, she has a brand-new Suburban from the Secret Service sitting out there in front of her house." But Mary told Kessler, "These stories are simply not true, and I have nothing but the utmost respect for the men and women of the Secret Service." [New York Post, 8/2/09]

Kessler Left Behind Credible Newspapers For Right-Wing NewsMax

Decades Ago, Kessler Was A Journalist At The Washington Post And Wall Street Journal. According to the biography on his website:

> Kessler began his career as a journalist in 1964 on the Worcester Telegram, followed by three years as an investigative reporter and editorial writer with the*Boston Herald*. In 1968, he joined the Wall Street Journal as a reporter in the New York bureau. He became an investigative reporter with the Washington Post in 1970 and continued in that position until 1985.
> Kessler has won eighteen journalism awards, including two George Polk awards--one for national reporting and one for community service. [RonaldKessler.com, accessed 7/31/14]

Kessler Joined Right-Wing NewsMax As Chief Washington Correspondent, Said He Was "Proud To Be Associated" With Outlet. From the 2006 press release announcing his hiring:

> "Ronald Kessler is a rare find," said NewsMax CEO Christopher Ruddy. "Few journalists can claim the enormous breadth and scope of the turf he has covered. He has a long history of combining quality work and balanced journalism, and he has an uncanny ability to ferret out news stories that other journalists miss."
> "Since I first learned about NewsMax, I've admired how, in order to tell the truth about subjects ranging from politics to medicine, it presents factual material that the rest of the media ignore," Mr. Kessler said. "I'm proud to be associated with an operation that practices journalism honestly and fairly." [NewsMax press release, June 2006]

NewsMax Was Founded By The Chief Promoter Of Vince Foster Conspiracy Theories. Bloomberg Businessweek wrote of NewsMax CEO and founder Christopher Ruddy:

> The suicide of Deputy White House Counsel Vincent Foster in 1993 became his defining story, and it was Ruddy who provided conservative talk radio with plenty of fuel for the wide-ranging conspiracy theories that sprang up.
> He left the Post in 1994 when billionaire Richard Mellon Scaife hired him to be the national correspondent for the Pittsburgh Tribune-Review. Ruddy would eventually turn his reporting on Foster into a book, The Strange Death of Vincent Foster, in 1997. [Bloomberg BusinessWeek, 3/6/14]

Kessler Left NewsMax in 2012 Citing "Editorial Changes." On December 19, 2012, Kessler sent the following message titled "left Newsmax" to a distribution email list that he had used to promote his articles: "Because of editorial changes, I am no longer at Newsmax. I am exploring other opportunities and developing the idea for my next book. All the best or [sic] the New Year!--Ron". [Kessler email obtained by Media Matters, 12/19/12]

NewsMax During Kessler's Tenure: A Hotbed Of Conspiracy Theories And Smears. From 2006 through 2012, NewsMax frequently promoted conspiracy theories that there were questions about President Obama's birth certificate (Kessler has written that "Obama was born in Hawaii"); repeatedly pushed false claims of "death panels" in health care legislation; published a column stating that a military coup "to resolve the 'Obama problem'" was not "unrealistic" (the column was taken down following an uproar); published a column that stated of the mass shooting in Aurora, Colorado, "One need not be a conspiracy freak to observe that such incidents seem to happen again and again at politically convenient moments for the left to exploit"; and stoked readers' fears of hyperinflation to sell financial products. Salon's Alex Pareene described the site in 2011 as a "nutritional supplement sales organization and expensive email list with a right-wing news website attached." [Media Matters, 8/8/12 ; NewsMax, 12/8/08]

Kessler Won Top Award At Conservative Political Action Conference (CPAC). Conservative activists at CPAC awarded Kessler the "Robert Novak Journalist of the Year" Award in 2010. NewsMax reported that in his speech accepting the award, Kessler said that he was "honored" to receive it. [NewsMax, 2/20/10]

Kessler Believes Fox News Is "Fair And Balanced" Compared To "Mainstream" Media. From Kessler's CPAC speech:

> I was on the Wall Street Journal and the Washington Post in the '70s and early '80s and I guarantee you, even though the editorials on the Washington Post were liberal, we would have been fired for doing the kinds of stories that appear in the media today. They're not only biased, they're dishonest, in many cases they suppress the truth, they suppress the other side, they ignore, or they have it in the last paragraph. And that's one reason why that the media are going downhill. The mainstream media.
> And on the other hand, we have Fox News, which is, which really is fair and balanced. Aside from their opinion shows, such as Glenn Beck, when they cover the news, they actually have a rule that every side has to be presented. When they have guests, they have to have both a Democrat and a Republican. So anybody who says it's not fair and balanced, I think, has either not watched it or is in denial. [Media Matters, 2/12/11]

Kessler's Smears Of Hillary Clinton

Kessler Accused Hillary Clinton Of "Pathological Lying." In a 2007 radio interview, Kessler said "I think people do want a -- a fresh start. They don't want to go backwards. And the other thing about Hillary, of course, is -- is her pathological lying, and that's going to come out." [KSFO, The Lee Rodgers & Melanie Morgan Program, 7/13/07, via Media Matters]

Kessler Pushed Conspiracy Theory That Hillary Clinton Drove Vince Foster To Suicide. In an August 2011 interview promoting The Secrets of the FBI, Kessler told Fox News of Robert Kennedy and Marilyn Monroe, "I surmise that he broke up with her and that's why she committed suicide, just given the timing." He went on to claim that then-deputy White House counsel Vince Foster "was depressed, he did commit suicide" because Clinton had "humiliated him in front of all these White House aides." [Fox News, Fox & Friends, 8/9/11, via Media Matters]

Kessler's Attacks On Barack Obama

Kessler Urged Republicans To Campaign On Obama's Ties to Rev. Jeremiah Wright. Prior to the 2008 election, Kessler wrote that the GOP should highlight Obama's ties to controversial pastor Rev. Jeremiah Wright "to illustrate how out of step he [Obama] is with most of America ... Wright holds the key to what Obama is all about, demonstrating his attraction to a left wing, anti-American agenda." [Newsmax, 10/28/08]

Kessler Falsely Reported That "Obama Attended Hate America Sermon" With Wright. As USA Today reported, in a March 2008 report under the headline "Obama attended hate America sermon," Kessler claimed that Obama had been present "during one of Rev. Jeremiah Wright's most inflammatory sermons, even though the Democratic presidential contender has said in the past he wasn't at the church when Wright made any of his controversial statements." Kessler based his report on a previous Newsmax article, which he later acknowledged was incorrect. [USA Today, 3/17/08]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Kessler Cited Jeremiah Wright In Explaining Why Romney Would Win In A "Landslide." Kessler wrote in a November 6, 2012, Newsmax column:

> Thus, Obama's comment that voters should vote for revenge sums up his motivation for running: to get back at the hated establishment, which by definition includes Republicans. While he may have been riffing on the expression "Living well is the best revenge," you don't talk about revenge against another individual unless you mean it. It's the same nasty attitude of the Rev. Jeremiah Wright Jr., his longtime preacher, sounding board, and mentor.
> Wright said America created the AIDS virus to kill off blacks. "We are only able to maintain our level of living by making sure that Third World people live in grinding poverty," Wright said. "God d America!" Thus, Obama emerges as the community organizer he once was -- and the exact opposite of the person Americans thought they were electing as president.
> According to "The Obamas," Obama looks forward to leaving the presidency. Then, writes Kantor, he would "finally be unencumbered by politics and free to create real, lasting change." That mirrors Obama's recent comment that change can only be achieved from outside Washington.
>
> As Mitt Romney said in response, "The president today threw in the white flag of surrender again. He said he can't change Washington from the inside. He can only change it from outside. Well, we're going to give him that chance in November. He's going outside."
> Last Sept. 4, I wrote the story "Why Mitt Romney Will Win Decisively." The shift to Republicans in the last congressional and gubernatorial elections, the intensity favoring Romney, and the early voting results on his side -- not to mention the state of the economy -- are all signs that point to the landslide I have been predicting. [NewsMax, 11/6/12]

Kessler Said There Was A Benghazi "Cover Up" By The White House. During a November 2012 Fox News interview, Kessler claimed then-UN Ambassador Susan Rice's controversial Sunday show appearances constituted a White House "cover up" of the Benghazi attacks:

> KESSLER: You don't have to be Sherlock Holmes to figure this out. It's clear that the CIA had the correct story. It's clear that the White House put out these people. They were representing the White House.
> The White House was calling the shots. The White House was trying to cover up the fact that there was a terrorist attack on 9/11. If you doubt that, look at what President Obama said several times trying to claim that a YouTube video was involved. So the president himself was covering up what the CIA was reporting.

A bipartisan Senate report concluded that there had been no White House "cover up" and that intelligence reports linked the inflammatory YouTube video to the Benghazi attacks. [Fox News, Hannity, 11/19/2012, via Nexis; Media Matters, 1/15/14]

Kessler Was Chief Promoter Of Donald Trump Running For President

Kessler Was Major Proponent Of A Donald Trump Presidential Run. Newsmax was "an early and enthusiastic promoter of Trump's presidential ambitions," with Kessler playing a leading role in that effort. In early 2011, as Trump sought to promote a potential run for office as well as his belief that President Obama's birth certificate might be a forgery, Kessler produced articles with headlines like "Trump Says He Will Run For President," "Don't Underestimate Donald Trump for President," and "Trump to Announce His Run for President" (Trump ultimately decided not to run for president, surprising no one except perhaps Kessler). [Newsmax, 1/3/11 , 1/20/11 , 4/14/11 ; Media Matters, 4/20/11 , 4/13/11]

Kessler Played A Political Role As A Go-Between For Trump's Nascent Effort. In an article headlined "Donald Trump Wows Conservatives at CPAC," Kessler admitted to being the go-between who extended Trump an invitation to speak at the conservative conference. He further reported: "This year's Conservative Political Action Conference (CPAC) focuses on the new kids on the block, the conservatives elected with tea party backing to overturn the liberal spending agenda in Washington. Nobody could have fit that description better than Donald Trump, who was a surprise speaker at CPAC and is planning to run for president." [Newsmax, 2/11/11]

The Candidates as High Rollers (TIME 7/2/08)
By Michael Scherer and Michael Weisskopf
The casino craps player is a social animal, a thrill seeker who wants not just to win but to win with a crowd. Unlike cards or a roulette wheel, well-thrown dice reward most everyone on the rail, yielding a collective yawp that drowns out the slots. It is a game for showmen, Hollywood stars and basketball legends with girls on their arms. It is also a favorite pastime of the presumptive Republican nominee for President, John McCain.

McCain's awkward Lieberman problem. (ThinkProgress 7/2/08)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Wall Street Journal's Laura Meckler notes that "Sen. John McCain says he's outraged that presidential rival Barack Obama opposed the Senate confirmation of Supreme Court Justice Samuel Alito and Chief Justice John Roberts." But McCain "seemed a lot less interested in criticizing his close friend" Joe Lieberman for opposing Alito. Lieberman explained his vote by saying, "It was a close call." Lieberman voted yes on Roberts.

McCain is no maverick (Boston Globe 7/3/08)

DURING the primaries, Barack Obama was said to be the darling of the news media. Not anymore. While the 2008 John McCain literally embraced W and courted the Religious Right, many in the news media believe he's secretly the 2000 McCain, who campaigned against W and the Religious Right.

McCain + Obama = a valid energy plan (USA Today 7/3/08)
For years, Washington has been so feckless in reacting to the energy crisis that it's sometimes hard to believe the nation's elected officials grasp the threat. By importing nearly 60% of the oil we use, we don't just leave ourselves vulnerable to higher prices and lower living standards, we prop up oil-rich nations that include some of our fiercest enemies.

He's No Decider, He's a Ditherer (Washington Post 7/3/08)
By Daniel Benjamin; B03
Conventional wisdom holds that George W. Bush's foreign policy failed because the president -- who famously called himself "the decider" -- is too, well, decisive. Bush's reckless, impulsive decision to invade Iraq, the argument goes, opened the door for Iran's ascendancy, distracted the United States from pursuing al-Qaeda more effectively in Afghanistan and Pakistan, diverted Western attention from a worsening relationship with Russia and so on.

Blast from the Past:
With McCain hitting Obama for Washington being 'broken' and claiming he has Democrats' praise, here's an old clip with some new meaning…
QUESTIONER: "…Can you tell us why we should vote for you over the Senator from Arizona?"

MITT ROMNEY: "...He spent 27 years in Washington ... I understand how the economy works. ... I understand how to grow an economy. I understand why jobs come in and why jobs go. We, we disagree on a number of issues, one of them I just mentioned was with regards to taxation. Um, he voted against the Bush tax cuts. Twice. He voted against the Bush tax cuts. That's failing Reagan 101. Reagan taught us, Reagan taught us all, he taught almost all of us in the Republican party that lowering taxes would grow the economy and was good for our economy and good for, good for individuals. And, uh, and I believe that the Republicans are gonna nominate a tax-cutter to become president of the United States."

McCain refuses to recognize that increased demand from China, etc. will offset gains to be made from offshore drilling AUDIENCE MEMBER: You understandably see this great optimism about reducing oil costs and energy more generally. But do you recognize the small likelihood that significantly decreasing the price of fuel at the pump and energy for our houses in the midst of enormous increase in demand from emerging economies, i.e. Brazil, China, and India?

JOHN MCCAIN: I do not recognize that. Thank you, though, for your question. In France it takes five years to build a nuclear power plant, five years. And France generates 80% of their electricity using nuclear power, 80%. I know I wasn't planning on taking French but the fact is they can do it, we can too. [...]We can do it through all of the above: wind, tide, nuclear, solar. [...] We have been sailing ships around the world, the United States Navy has, for sixty years, a nuclear power plants on them. Why not in the world can't we do that too? [...]

McCain suggests Iraq is "better off" because Saddam would have used revenues from $118/ barrel oil to acquire WMDs [audio]
JOHN MCCAIN: I just want to say a word about the situation in Iraq […] and we will be able to withdraw, as -- just as you do whenever a successful counterinsurgency succeeds. […] And I'd love to tell you that there's a parade down Broadway or there's a peace signing on the USS Missouri, but there's not. What success is, and winning, which we are winning, and we've succeeded, is a government that can govern effectively, the social fabric is renewed, and the economic life continues. And that's exactly -- is reinvigorated -- and that's exactly what's happened in Iraq. And we've -- it's been purchased at great sacrifice.

And as a friend of mine said today when we were talking, what do you think Iraq would be like if Saddam Hussein were still there and oil was 120 (dollars) or $118 a barrel? The sanctions were breaking down; the -- he obviously stated unequivocally that he wanted to acquire and use weapons of mass destruction, which he had twice before. There was a $12 billion oil-for-food program going on, a scandal going on in the United Nations. And I think the Iraqi people are a great deal better off now that he and his sadistic sons are no longer with us.

So I'm proud of what's happened in Iraq, and it's incredible to me that Senator Obama cannot acknowledge the fact that the surge succeeded. No rational person can look at what's happened over the last two years and say that the surge hadn't succeeded. And it has, and it's due to a great general, most of all to these brave young Americans.

And I don't see how you can go down and meet the last of these five brigades that's coming home and tell them thanks for serving but, by the way, you're part of the surge and your strategy didn't succeed. You -- you can't do that.

JOHN MCCAIN: I want to say a word about offshore drilling. We need to do it. We need to do it now, and we need to do it here in the United States of America and not send our money overseas.

I met with a group of independent petroleum executives the other day and they said we could increase some of our oil supply in a matter of months by using existing facilities. And in a year or two, they believe that they could discover and start increasing our oil supply offshore.

We have to do it. We have to do it soon. Obviously, Senator Obama's still opposed to it. He's still opposed to nuclear. And I -- I agree with the American Automobile Association; we should all inflate our tires. And I think that the American Automobile Association is right, as well as others are. JOHN MCCAIN: Because I'm a great American. (Laughs.) […] We've got 93 days, and I hope that you and other Independent or undecided voters on the line will look at our positions on the issues. I respect and admire Senator Obama. He has inspired a lot of Americans. He's won the nomination of his party over a very talented and, I think, outstanding candidate in Senator Hillary Clinton, and I admire and respect him. But the differences are just basically how we view the role of government.

Subject: [big campaign] New Huff Post from Creamer-Big Banks Plan Sneak Attack on Wall Street Reform

Big Banks Plan Sneak Attack on Wall Street Reform Law within Days

The big Wall Street banks are planning a sneak attack on an essential element of the Wall Street Reform Law that was passed by Congress last year. They plan to make their move as early as next week.

The target of their attack is the provision limiting the "interchange" fee that the Big Banks charge retailers and their consumers every time a debit card is used. Right now, so-called "swipe fees" are set by Visa and MasterCard – who control 80% of all credit card transactions. In other words, they are not subject to competitive market pressure of any sort. They are fixed by the Visa-MasterCard duopoly.

According to the Federal Reserve, $16.2 billion of debit interchange fees were paid in 2009.

It is estimated that the Financial Reform Law will save consumers $10 billion of that total. How could that be? Because it should come as no surprise to anyone who has even a passing acquaintance with Economics 101, that fees set by a duopoly have no relationship whatsoever to the costs of the transaction.

They are in fact just one more mechanism that Wall Street has used to siphon an increasing percentage of our Gross Domestic Product out of the pockets of the middle class and into the increasingly-bloated financial sector.

The central problem of our economy – and society – is that virtually every dime of the considerable economic growth of the last twenty years has gone to the top two percent of the population. Wall Street salaries and bonuses have exploded, while middle class incomes have stagnated.

From 1948 to 1980, profits generated by the financial sector represented from 5% to 15% of all U.S. business profits. Then they began to creep up – and finally explode – to an unbelievable 40% right before the Great Recession. They dropped briefly– and by the end of 2009, they were back to 36% .

Let's remember that the financial sector does not make anything. Its goal is to take a little piece of every transaction as money flows through its hands – what novelist Tom Wolff calls the "golden crumbs."

In the last twenty years, the exploding financial sector has sucked the lifeblood out of the American middle class. It has vacuumed money out of the pockets of people who actually work for living producing goods and services. It has siphoned off virtually every dime of economic growth so that real middle class incomes have actually fallen at the same time the economy has grown. That wasn't just disastrous for the middle class – it was catastrophic for our entire economy. It meant that there weren't enough consumer dollars available to buy new goods and services – a problem that was temporarily solved by the credit bubble until it ultimately collapsed and cost eight million Americans their jobs.

To put it simply, the financial sector – and especially the big Wall Street banks – are a huge cancer growing on our economy.

To have an economy that will allow long-term, widely shared, growth – we have to shrink the financial sector and put money back into the hands of companies that produce actual goods and services, and consumers who buy them.

The Wall Street Reform Law made a big step in the direction of reining in the big Wall Street banks. And a key element of that law was the provision that prevents the duopoly power of those Big Banks – exercised through Visa and MasterCard – from fixing the price of the fees merchants pay every time you use your debit card.

The new law requires that these fees must be reasonable and proportionate to the cost of running a debit transaction over that network's wires. But it turns out their actual cost of providing this service is very low. If prices for "swipe fees" were set by the competitive market, they would dramatically fall because of competitive pressure. But since the prices are set through a duopoly they allow gigantic profits for the banks.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Right now Visa and MasterCard – at their sole discretion -- set different fee rates for different types of debit transactions. For example, they charge higher fee rates for small businesses than for large ones. Most debit interchange fee rates are set as a percentage of the transaction amount plus a flat fee (e.g., 0.95% + $0.20). The Fed found that the average interchange fee for all debit transactions in 2009 was 44 cents per transaction, or 1.14% of the transaction amount.

The Fed put out a draft rulemaking in December 2010 that suggested options for reform. Both of the options suggested limiting interchange fee rates for the biggest 1% of banks to 12 cents per transaction (down from the average 44 cents per transaction today). This comes close to the 0.2% debit interchange rate that Visa and MasterCard recently agreed to use in the European Union. A reduction of this amount would save U.S. consumers around $10 billion per year.

Now, this proposed rate is obviously not below their costs, since that's what they agreed to charge in Europe.

But the big banks are desperate to hang onto the gusher of profit that comes out of American pockets.

They have used their enormous lobbying muscle to convince some otherwise decent Senators, that this is really nothing more than a battle between the banks and retail merchants. Baloney. Non-competitive "swipe fees" are just one more way they reach into the pool of money generated by the real economy and set it aside so it can end up as part of some Wall Street Banker's multi-million dollar bonus check. And you can be certain that most retailers don't eat the costs of "swipe fees." They pass the vast majority of these costs on to consumers in the form of higher prices.

Nonetheless, next week the big banks hope to get the Senate to pass an amendment "delaying" implementation of this law. This delay would save the banks – and cost consumers – about $10 billion a year, simple as that. The provision's original sponsor, Senator Dick Durbin (D-IL), promises to lay down on the tracks to prevent them from being successful. But there is still a grave danger that the bankers will succeed.

That's because the big banks hope to conduct this attack without a great deal of public notice. They have conducted a vigorous PR campaign inside the beltway, but out in the rest of the country, no one has heard word one about this issue.

And this is just the beginning. If they are successful with "swipe fees," they will be emboldened to try to gut other sections of this critical law.

The big banks do well under cover of darkness. When they are exposed to the bright light of public attention – as they were during the battle over financial reform – consumers had the high political ground. The Wall Street reform bill got tougher as it moved through the legislative process because Members of Congress were afraid to side with Wall Street against ordinary Americans.

Now, the big banks hope to conduct their attack on the Financial Reform Law while the voters are focused on a new war in Libya, a nuclear disaster in Japan, the battle over collective bargaining and March Madness.

Big bank lobbyists are like cockroaches. When you turn on the light they scatter, but they take over if they're allowed to operate in the dark.

When you've finished reading this article, pick up the phone, call your Senator and turn on the light. Tell them to keep Wall Street from gutting this key provision of the Wall Street Reform Law.

Subject: PPI WEEKLY UPDATE: Iran Negotiations, Net Neutrality, & Regulation in the Digital Age

IRAN NUCLEAR NEGOTIATIONS: Today, PPI President Will Marshall wrote an op-ed for The Hill, "Holding Out Hope On Iran," outlining the differences between the United States and Iran as we work to negotiate a nuclear deal and arguing that the Obama administration is right to give diplomacy another chance. "Given the magnitude of such differences, it's easy to be pessimistic about nuclear diplomacy with Iran," Marshall writes. "On balance, however, giving the talks a little more time is a gamble worth taking. This conclusion is not a vote of confidence in Iran, or even in Obama. Rather, it reflects the reality that all the other alternatives are worse."

NET NEUTRALITY: Last week, PPI Senior Fellow Hal Singer joined, "The Great Net Neutrality Debate: Should the FCC Ban Paid Prioritization?" The event featured a debate on net neutrality with leading experts in tech policy, including Singer; Marvin Ammori, Fellow, New America Foundation; Jonathan Baker, Professor of Law, American University; and Berin Szoka, President, TechFreedom. Video of the event can be seen here.

See Also: "The Best Path Forward on Net Neturality," by Singer and Brookings Non-Resident Senior Fellow Robert Litan.

REGULATION IN THE DIGITAL AGE: Last week, PPI Economist Diana Carew wrote an op-ed for The Hill, "Outdated cable box rule harms the data-driven economy." "Innovating in the digital age requires flexible rules that keep pace with the latest technology," Carew writes. "This is especially true in the video services market, where change has been fast and furious. That's why Congress should act to repeal an expensive and innovation-restricting requirement on the design of set-top cable boxes — without limiting the choice of retail devices that consumers enjoy today."

A study by PPI Chief Economic Strategist Michael Mandel and Carew was cited as evidence of current regulatory obstructions for entrepreneurs in a Huffington Post op-ed by U.S. Representatives Scott Peters (D-Calif.), Ron Kind (D-Wis.), and Patrick E. Murphy (D-Fla.). "The Federal Code of Regulations numbers nearly 170,000 pages, and more pages are added to the code almost every single day," writes Reps. Peters, Kind, and Murphy. "An analysis by the Progressive Policy Institute shows that the number of pages in the code more than doubled since 1975. We have a choice: We can either grow the mounds of paper that our entrepreneurs have to sift through to launch new ventures, or we can make the code simpler and easier to navigate, allowing our economy to grow and create new jobs."

Success of McCain Attack Ads Considered (CNN 08/03/08 09:30am)

REBECCA ROBERTS: … I think that if the goal of the McCain campaign was to get all of us to talk about it, they've seceded. If the goal was to get people to change their vote, I'm not so sure. You're criticizing someone for being popular? Is that the strategy? Really? And you know there has been a lot of reading between the lines about the choice of Brittany and Paris and young blond women and all of that. I'm not sure it was that well thought through. I think they were just trying to take Senator Obama's strength that he was very popular, draws huge crowds and try and turn it into a weakness. I think the jury is out and rather or not they succeeded on doing that.

Tom Ridge Discusses the Message of "Celeb" Ad (ABC 08/03/08 10:20am)

TOM RIDGE: … I think the message, uh, there were two messages embodied I believe in that commercial. The first one I think frankly probably a not so subtle recognition that Senator Obama is very telegenic he is very popular, he has paparazzi swarming all over him, where he goes he gets a big crowd. But the broader message is its not about drawing a crowd it is about dealing with issues and if you move back into that ad it talks very much about critical issue to this country its future and that's energy. He doesn't want to drill, he will tax electricity, he doesn't want nuclear. So at the end of the day the message in that is that you can be a very charismatic figure

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOULOS: Well as a matter of fact Factcheck.org has looked at that claim that he will tax electricity and they say it is simply not true. That Senator Obama has a very similar cap and trade proposal to Senator McCain and if you are going to charge that Senator Obama is taxing electricity you would have to level that same exact charge against Senator McCain.

RIDGE: Well, I think George, that the commercial elevates the whole question of energy policy in a way that some people like and some people don't like… The point of this ad is energy policy is serious is a serious deficiency in this country vis-à-vis an energy policy. We have been waiting 20 or 30 years to get one. John McCain has suggested that we have an all above approach. Lets talk Nuclear, lets talk drilling, lets talk Bio-Fuels, its not lets talk bio-fuels in a way that is smart and doesn't disrupt the agriculture community. Lets get it all on the table. And Obama, Senator Obama excuse me. Has said no nuclear, no

STEPHANOPOULOS: Seems open to drilling right now

RIDGE: Well no he said that in the morning and later on in the afternoon he clarified his position and said I am opposed to drilling. He is opposed to drilling.

STEPHANOPOULOS: But he said he would accept it as part of a comprehensive package.

[…]

RIDGE: … end of the day I think members of both parties are moving closer and closer to Senator McCain's position… That ad was about energy and lets get serious, lets recognize who he is, very charismatic, gives great speeches but it is substance time. 90 days left to go, lets talk issues.

Lieberman Puts Forward Arguments on Social Security Taxes, Drilling and the Surge, Kerry Shuts them Down (NBC 08/03/08 10:55am)

TOM BROKAW: . . . Senator McCain has been very adamant about not raising taxes. That prompted this headline in The Wall Street Journal . . . he says, "Is John McCain Stupid? Is John McCain losing it? He said on national television that to solve Social Security, "everything's on the table," which of course means raising payroll taxes. On July 7th, he said 'Sen. Obama will raise your taxes. I won't.' This isn't a flip-flop. It's a sex-change operation."

JOE LIEBERMAN: First, let me say John remains all male. There is no question about that. Secondly, he's a smart, curious, intellectually alert as possible. That's why he loves the town hall meetings, that's why he keeps challenging Barack Obama to come and do a town hall meeting with him . . .

BROKAW: If everything is on the table for social security reform that does include raising of payroll taxes, does it not?

JOHN KERRY: Absolutely.

LIEBERMAN: . . . two main reasons I'm for John McCain. One is he's ready to be commander in chief and to deal with our problems at home and abroad. Secondly, we got a big problem here in Washington that we have to solve before we get to solve social security, jobs, gas crisis, and environment, everything else. It's partisanship. And John McCain . . . has a record, he is a restless reformer . . . What I'm saying we need to fix social security so it's there for the next generation.

BROKAW: And that may include an increase in payroll taxes.

LIEBERMAN: John McCain said very clearly he doesn't want to raise any taxes but he also said, because he's a great negotiator, I want to sit down with everybody the way Ronald Reagan and Tip O'Neill did in the 1980s and we're going to solve this, like we're going to make progress on health care and the energy crisis and climate change by breaking through the partisan gridlock. He's going to demand we start to act not like Democrats or Republicans but like Americans, that's what the people want us to do.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

BROKAW: . . . This past week President Bush talked about the possibility of drawing down troops and he's going to shorten the tours . . . Senator Kerry, why is it so hard for Democrats to say the surge worked?

[. . .]

KERRY: . . . the reason the gas discussion so fraudulent is that the oil companies have 68 million acres currently, leases, available to them now. 40 million of them offshore and they are not drilling there. 95% of the Alaska oil shelf is open for drilling today . . .

[. . .]

KERRY: . . . On the surge, Joe and John McCain have both alleged that the surge created the Anbar Awakening. It did not. The Anbar Awakening began in 2005 and 2006, one of the local leaders in the tribe in Anbar province . . . put together 32 sheikhs . . . they organized the Anbar Salvation Council. They then went out and took on al Qaeda and our military personnel adjusted with that at the time, the fact is that the Ramadi Construction Conference took place and the administration didn't get a troop in there until after they made the political decision to become involved with the Americans. The surge added to that. If you add American troops to the equation, American troops can always provide some additional security.

[. . .]

LIEBERMAN: . . . the sheikhs don't want our troops to come home on a fixed timetable. They want us to stay . . .

KERRY: The Prime Minister of Iraq believes we should set a timetable. The President, Mr. Talibani wants us to set a timetable. I heard countless numbers of Iraqis say we'd be better off with a timetable. In fact, I met with the governor of Anbar province and all of the sheiks who said they are comfortable with a timetable providing that obviously it is one that works in the context.

LIEBERMAN: . . . Maliki and Obama are not on the same page on this.

KERRY: . . . John McCain was wrong about Iraq. He was wrong about why we ought to go there, he bought into a whole liberation theology about the Middle East with Paul Wolfowitz and others . . . He was wrong about oil paying for the war, wrong about being greeted as liberation heroes, he's been wrong about Afghanistan not being a center of activity against us. He said no one threatens us in Afghanistan.

LIEBERMAN: John McCain was right about the surge and he had the guts to go up against President Bush, Secretary Rumsfeld and public opinion . . . because he didn't want America to lose . . . Senator Obama took the opposite position. Wasn't concerned about losing in Iraq . . .

BROKAW: Can we show you a Joe Lieberman website he may not be welcoming. There is a website out there in which they say get rid of Joe, Lieberman must go, more than 50,000 signatures have been signed so far. You think you're going to be comfortable next year in the Democratic Caucus as a self-described Independent Democrat?

LIEBERMAN: Look. I crossed party lines to support John McCain because this is not an ordinary time in our history . . . And I just felt more than following the party line; I had to go with the guy I thought would best serve this country, that's John McCain.

BROKAW: Are you going to speak at the Republican Convention?

LIEBERMAN: . . . Am I going to speak at the convention? . . . that decision hasn't been made. If Senator McCain feels I can help his candidacy which I think is so important to elect him our next president, I will do it. But I assure you this Tom. I'm not going to go to the convention, the Republican Convention and spend my time attacking Barack Obama. I'm going to go there really talking about why I support John McCain . . . Frankly, I'm going to go to a partisan convention and tell them if I go, why it's so important that we start to act like Americans and not as partisan mudslingers.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

BROKAW: Sounds like you're going to go.

LIEBERMAN: We'll see.

KERRY: Sounds like that to me, too.

Lieberman: "Celeb" Ad "Cute", In No Way Demeaning (NBC 08/03/08 10:35am)
TOM BROKAW: . . . This is a discussion of issues, also of tone because the tone is an important part of a presidential campaign and this campaign is running at full throttle already . . . Senator Lieberman, let me share with you . . . Senator McCain had to say earlier about the tone of the campaign.

JOHN MCCAIN: This will be a respectful campaign. Americans want a respectful campaign. They're tired of the attacks, tired of impugning people's character and integrity. They want a respectful campaign and I'm of the firm belief that they'll get it and they can get it if the American people demand it and reject a lot of this negative stuff that goes on.

BROKAW: And just this past week you said to the Palm Beach Post, "there is a problem in Washington that problem is partisanship, people going to Washington acting like children having a mud fight." You think running a campaign ad in which you feature Britney spears and Paris Hilton with Barack Obama is respectful?

JOE LIEBERMAN: I do. First off, you know, we all ought to relax a bit. It's a bit of humor, a way to draw people into the ad. Incidentally, the McCain campaign has another ad in which they seem to be comparing Obama to Moses so in my book that's about as good a comparison as you could ask for. I should say in The Book it's about as good a comparison as you should ask for. But look, there is a serious point to that ad. And it gets right to it which is, is not with standing his celebrity status Barack Obama ready to lead? And my answer is no, that Barack Obama is a gifted, eloquent young man who can -- and I hope will give great leadership to America in the years ahead but the question is who's ready to be president on January 20th, 2009 with the economy in a crisis, and facing dangerous enemies abroad, it's clearly John McCain. We only have two choices, John McCain, Barack Obama.

BROKAW: . . . by including Britney spears and Paris Hilton, two lightweights known primarily as just targets of paparazzi around the world, with senator Obama. Isn't that demeaning?

LIEBERMAN: No . . . First, I think it's cute. A lot of –

BROKAW: What does he have to do with Paris Hilton or Britney spears?

LIEBERMAN: The point is particularly after the trip to Europe, essentially holding a political rally of 200,000 in . . . Berlin. Bigger crowd than he's gotten in . . . America and he's gotten some big crowds. This ad raises the question, we're not deciding who's our favorite celebrity, who we are fans of. We're doing something very serious at a time when our economy is hurting a lot of people . . . and we still are in a war against the Islamist terrorists who attacked us on 9/11. Look beyond the celebrity status is what this ad is saying. This is a good young man. Is he ready to lead or as ready as John McCain, no. In fact, the ad goes to a specific point which is senator Obama is against offshore drilling for oil . . . and to try to stop the painful increase in gas prices and home heating oil prices. John McCain is for both of those, John McCain is for alternative energy, for nuclear power, for off shore drilling . . . What Barack Obama did over the weekend about off shore drilling is a tease . . .

BROKAW: . . . This is what senator Obama had to say in response to the ad that included Britney spears and Paris Hilton.

OBAMA: . . . The only strategy they've got in this election is to try to scare you about me . . . he doesn't look like all the presidents on the dollar bills . . .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

BROKAW: And right away the manager from McCain campaign said that's the introduction of the race card as he described it, Rick Davis. "Barack Obama has played the race card, he played it from the bottom of the deck. It's divisive, negative, shameful and wrong." Senator Kerry, by using the language that he did saying I don't look like the president on a dollar bill or a $5 bill wasn't he in effect saying they are picking on me because I'm black.

JOHN KERRY: No. What he was saying they're trying to scare you, trying to scare the American people. And believe me, I'm an expert how they do that. They are engaged in character assassination. Even John McCain's partner in a number of initiatives in the Senator Russ Feingold said yesterday they decided they can't win on the issues so now they are going to try to destroy his character . . . John McCain himself you quoted him, John McCain said I want to have a campaign not of insults but of ideas. I mean, Joe, what's the idea? What is the idea? Let me say, what is the idea?

KERRY: It doesn't mention not ready to lead, doesn't mention off shore drilling. It tries to insinuate his celebrity is somehow all he has. I'm going to get to the other. But this is you know, this is a complete contradiction in John McCain. John McCain said he wants a campaign of ideas, not insults. John McCain who said the American people want a campaign that's respectful. Even you, Joe, ten years ago, you went to the floor of the United States Senate and you said that our public life is coarsening . . . That's an ad that plays to the worst instincts in America, which is to diminish someone's character. And then Karl Rove turns around and Karl Rove brings up a statement saying Obama is like the guy at the country club with the beautiful date and a martini and a cigarette in his hand . . .

LIEBERMAN: Karl Rove doesn't work for the McCain campaign.

KERRY: They just hired Karl Rove's top protégé to produce these ads. Believe me, they talked to Karl Rove.

BROKAW: When senator Obama responded he didn't talk just about his character, he also talked about his appearance. That's what prompted the McCain campaign . . .

KERRY: What he was talking about is campaign to scare about the person and that's what they do, they try to scare about the person. They try to attack the character. They can't win on health care, they can't win on the economy . . . [Joe] said the question is is he ready to lead . . . What people are electing is a president who has the judgment to do what's right for America. Barack Obama was right about Iraq. Now George Bush, Prime Minister Maliki think we ought to set a deadline. Afghanistan. John McCain has been the slowest person to come to the question of Afghanistan and adding troops. He was right about Pakistan, that we ought to have the ability to go in and take out a terrorist and John McCain criticized him for taking that position. He's been right about North Korea and Iran and the notion that we ought to negotiate. Now the Bush administration is negotiating. The Bush administration has moved toward Barack Obama, not John McCain. And John McCain's judgment has been wrong, and it's dangerous for America.

Lieberman: "John McCain Does Not Have a Bigoted Bone in His Body" (NBC 08/03/08 10:45am)
TOM BROKAW: . . . this is former general Wesley Clark talking about John McCain. He said, "I don't think riding in a fighter plane and getting shot down is a qualification to be president." He described him as untested and untried . . .

JOHN KERRY: I don't agree with was Clark's comment. I think it was entirely inappropriate. I have nothing but enormous respect for John McCain's service . . .

BROKAW: Unless I missed it, senator Obama has not specifically rebuked Wesley Clark.

KERRY: . . . I thought Obama had at the time. Here's what's important. Let's not get lost in this. John McCain said this ought to be about big ideas. Medicare is about to implode. You know, John McCain has a health care plan that every expert has said does nothing for the people who have no health care.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

JOE LIEBERMAN: Not true.

KERRY: It does nothing for the people that have no health care. Doesn't have a plan that's comprehensive to provide health care to all Americans. He's against the energy plan for tax credits for people in order to help them with the energy crisis. Why? He came out against this plan of the people in congress on energy because he wants to protect Exxon.

BROKAW: Let's talk about energy for a moment if we can because there have been several bills. A bipartisan coalition of ten senators wants to expand offshore drilling and they want to end a tax credit on oil companies. Senator Obama in the past has often said that he opposed offshore drilling . . . here's what senator Obama had to say over the weekend. "My interest is in making sure that we've got the kind of comprehensive energy policy that can bring down gas prices. If in order to get that passed we have to compromise in terms of a careful, well thought out, drilling strategy that was carefully circumscribed to avoid significant environmental damage I don't want to be so ridged that we can't get something done."

KERRY: . . . Barack Obama doesn't want to drill offshore, doesn't believe it's the thing to do . . . He doesn't want to do that. But if that's what gets us to the energy independence . . . Here's the bottom line. Guess what. John McCain out of hand just rejected that proposal, telling The Wall Street Journal that it would result in raising taxes on the oil companies, on Exxon. Exxon Mobil made $12 billion last quarter alone. No American corporation has ever made that much money in history, and john McCain wants to protect it.

BROKAW: . . . He didn't want a rollback of the taxes. Those taxes were originally designed to create jobs. Exxon Mobil did make $11.68 billion.

LIEBERMAN: . . . The question is offshore drilling. We've got a crisis here. We're not only sending more than $700 billion a year to the Middle East and other places that don't like us much every time we go to the pump . . . John McCain sees the crisis and watch the reaction of McCain and Obama here. It will tell you what kind of president they might be. It tells you why McCain's experience gives him judgment and strength of decision that we need. John McCain says, we need alternative energy, yes, we're moving toward a low hydrocarbon future but John McCain says we need to drill offshore. That's American oil, we need to bring it into the market to help lower gas prices and make us energy independent. Barrack Obama says this weekend maybe . . .

KERRY: It is an absolutely fraudulent offering to America. Drilling -- let me tell you why. We only have three percent of the world oil reserves. 65% of the oil comes from the Mideast . . .

LIEBERMAN: . . . In the short-term, drill for American oil where we can find it and get it safely. That's offshore . . . John McCain presented the boldest alternative energy . . . proposals that are around today. The racial question here. I speak personally. In the first place, the McCain campaign is to use Barack Obama's words raising the question risky guy but it has nothing to do with his name or his skin color. It has to do with his lack of experience and bad judgment. His unreadiness to be president. When you use the expression that senator Obama did three times this week, you're making a personal insult to john McCain. I know john McCain, I've been with him for 20 years, private and public. This man does not have a bigoted bone in his body. His wife and he adopted a baby from Bangladesh who they love. It's just wrong for senator Obama to have done that. It was right for the campaign to call him on . . .

Fiorina Outlines McCain's Economic Plan Defends His Position on Social Security Taxes (CBS 08/03/08 10:40am)
BOB SCHIEFFER: . . . You heard what Mr. Ruben just said . . . that is that this economic situation could actually get worse. What is your take on the where things are right now and where we go from here?

CARLY FIORINA: Well, I certainly agree with him that the situation could get worse. And there are a couple of things that will make it worse. One is to raise taxes, which is what Senator Obama proposes to do. Another is to massively increase government spending, which is what senor Obama would propose to do over a trillion and a half in increased government spending. The third is to become isolationist and protectionist which senator Obama would . . . do. Conversely, Senator McCain has proposed a series of tax cuts including but not limited to giving every family with a dependent a doubling of the exemption for dependents . . . he's proposed to leave the capital gains tax right where it is as opposed to doubling is, which is what Barack Obama would do. That impacts 100 million Americans. He has proposed a comprehensive energy plan to wean us from our dependence on foreign oil. And as well he has proposed a plan to help keep Americans in their homes as we see the credit crisis continuing to get worse and finally, he is focused on accelerating job creation in this country and that means helping small businesses form and grow, because all businesses is the engine of growth in this economy.

SCHIEFFER: Let me just, that all sounds great and there's some good programs in there. But you know, last week the government announced that we have a $480 billion deficit. How do you do all of that? Surely this has to stop somewhere.

FIORINA: Well, first of all the deficit is a huge problem. And senator McCain has consistently said that he will make sure that we balance the budget by 2013. How is that possible? Well, couple of things. First, you have to get the economy growing again . . . That's why, by the way a comprehensive proposal for weaning ourselves off of foreign oil is so important. And by the way, Senator Obama has consistently opposed offshore drilling and yet it's clear that offshore drilling is an important part of comprehensive energy proposal . . . Secondly, we have to get government spending under control. John McCain has never asked for an earmark. He has promised he would veto every bill . . .

SCHIEFFER: Let me ask you about that because John McCain, the whole core of his campaign is the other guy is going to raise your taxes and I won't . . . John McCain seemed to back off a bit of that and said, well, when it comes to payroll taxes, saving Social Security that's just basically a negotiating point . . .

JOHN MCCAIN: I will say that everything has to be on the table if we're going to reach a bipartisan agreement. I've been in bipartisan negotiations before. I know how you reach a conclusion. We all have to sit down together with everything on the table.

GEORGE STEPHANOPOLOUS: That means payroll tax increase are on the table as well.

MCCAIN: There's nothing that's off the table. I have my positions. I'll articulate them. Nothing is off the table.

SCHIEFFER: How do you say, I'm not going to raise your taxes then say, but nothing is off the table.

FIORINA: First of all, Senator McCain, with his vast experience in bipartisan discussions understands that you don't begin a negotiation with an ultimatum . . . John McCain has been very explicit in saying he does not support an increase in payroll taxes . . . His record is very clear on that. And he has a number of economists who support his assertion that we can solve the Social Security and Medicare crisis but particularly social security without raising payroll taxes . . . But again you don't start a negotiation with an ultimatum. You start a negotiation with an open mind.

SCHIEFFER: But if that's what you're going to do, then how can you say, I promise you I won't raise your taxes? I mean, just seems like –

FIORINA: I think he's making –

SCHIEFFER: Two totally different things.

FIORINA: He's making his position very clear which is payroll tax increases are not the solution. He has been consistent in that position for the last many, many months, even as his opponent has proposed increases in payroll taxes. And in this regard he is supported by a number of noted economists, whether those are people from Marty Feldstein at Harvard or John Taylor at Stanford a whole lot of experts agree with him . . .

SCHIEFFER: All right. What programs would he cut specifically?

FIORINA: Well, one of the things that John McCain has said for many months now is that he would immediately institute a freeze in increases in discretionary spending for one year . . . I also know that when federal spending has increased 60% in the last seven years, there is a lot of fat, and a lot of opportunity to cut spending without cutting effective programs that make a difference to the American taxpayer.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Pfotenhauer Defends McCain Economic and Tax Policy Including tax Cuts for Exxon Mobile (CNN 08/03/08 11:00am)
NANCY PHOTENHAUER: I think it is rather amusing because Senator Obama has been dragged kicking and screaming into this situation and the only reason he is where he is right now. He claims he has not changed his position by the way on drilling. That is his words.

WOLF BLITZER: He says he is ready to support it if its part of this comprehensive package. And the questions to you is Senator McCain ready to support this compromise .

PHOTENHAUER: Senator McCain is open to compromise packages but the bottom line here and I think what the American people need to focus on is the fact that Senator Obama is only in this position now because it became patently obvious over the last weeks particularly not when Nancy Pelosi turned off the lights in the House of Representatives and Republican members refused to leave she had an insurrection in her own party because Pelosi and Reid at Obama's behest were refusing to move forward on drilling. So he, he is, he is now trying to get credit for being all of the above energy plan.

PHOTENHAUER: He is referring to the corporate rate reduction

BLITZER: Which Exxon Mobile would benefit from

PHOTENHAUER: Which Jason Forman, His top economic advisor supported up until he went to the campaign. We have the second worse corporate tax rate in the world. We are tied for last place with Japan. We have one tenth of one percent better. We got a 35 percent rate we are competing against countries like Ireland that have less then half that rate. And let me just circle this back to energy policy and taxes. Senator Obama is advocating at this time a windfall profits tax. It is economic masochism. The last time it was tried in this country it reduced domestic production and it increased prices for consumers at the pump. So it increases our reliance on foreign oil and it increases prices. It is absolutely a terrible energy policy at this time.

BLITZER: But with Exxon Mobile having record profits of 15 billion dollars over the last quarter, the last three months alone. Does Exxon Mobile need another Billion dollar tax break?

PHOTENHAUER: You don't do tax policy based on one company. You do tax policy based on what will spur economic growth and what will create jobs. And that is precisely the plan that Senator McCain has put together. Which is why 21 out of 29 economist surveyed said it would be better for the economy and even the tax policy center characterized the two plans, Senator McCain's as job producing and economic growth producing and Senator Obama's as progressive meaning he is re-slicing the pie. He is not growing the pie he is not creating jobs.

PHOTENHAUER: The tax policy center does not take into consideration spending side. Therefore any deficit production, prediction, they made is inherently flawed. And I'm talking all capitol letters flawed… the other thing about tax policy the tax policy center acts as if massive increases in taxes do not effect investment, they act as if massive tax cuts do not effect investments. Well guess what. Tax cuts spur investment tax increases depress it.

BLITZER: But Senator Obama says should these companies that ship jobs overseas continue to get tax breaks from the American public.

PHOTENHAUER: He, I don't even know what he is talking about. He is talking in such broad terms. The bottom line is we right now penalize companies for locating in this country… By the way tax policy center it's a liberal think tank. It is the equivalent; the equivalent on the right would be the heritage foundation. Just keep that in mind. It is run by Clinton administration people. Jason Forman worked for them. Up into about a month ago. So just keep that in mind when we cite them as if they are the oracle. Because they are not.

Highlight #3
Kurtz and Panel Discuss McCain's Muddled No New Taxes Message (CNN 08/03/08 10:15am)
HOWARD KURTZ: It seems like a straightforward question for journalist. Where does John McCain stand on raising taxes? He has ruled it out throughout his campaign. But last week he had this to say during a discussion of social security with ABC's George Stephanopoulos.

[Clip of McCain's "This Week" Interview 7/27/08}

KURTZ: But then McCain's old spokesman seemed to contradict the boss.

[Video clip of FNC interview with Tucker Bounds]

TUCKER BOUNDS: … there is no imaginable circumstance where John McCain would raise payroll taxes it is absolutely out of the question.

KURTZ: The media take is that McCain changed his position, fair or unfair?

ROGER SIMON: Well when you say nothing you can get accused of saying anything. The fact is McCain has said he is not going to raise taxes and then he goes on the same show and say's everything is on the table . The only two real solutions for Social Security are raising taxes or cutting benefits. So you know this double speak, this non-speak is really one of the reasons people hate politics…

A.B. STODDARD: He is doing a straddle. He is on the fence and when he goes to the new side it will be a flip flop. What he is trying to do is say two things at the same time. He is trying to say, oh I will never raise taxes, everyone knows I have opposed all tax increases, he always says, but everything will be on the table in these discussions he said it eight times in four questions… he is trying to say both things at the same time

[…]

SIMON: Our most finally tuned meter is the hypocrisy meter… McCain's case he had the opportunity it is not just going back to what he said, it is going back and then forward and then back and you don't know what he said by the end of the day which is exactly what they want to do.

Subject:	Iran

Dear Jake,

At our offices tomorrow, I am hosting the. Geo-Political Group for the Jewish People's Policy Institute (JPPI) of Jerusalem, which Dennis and I co-chair. We will have the heads of ADL, AIPAC, The Conference of Presidents of Major Jewish Organizations, and the leadership of major UJA Federations (e.g. NY and Chicago), along with several of our security experts from Jerusalem (e.g. former general Michael Herzog, Avi Gill, and Einat Wilf).

Secretary Kerry's remark Friday that the international community might blame Israel if Congress blocked the Iran deal and Israel might "wind up being more isolated", is truly outrageous. While Hillary obviously cannot take him on directly, she could stress the following, building on her Iran statement:

1. While she supports the Iran agreement, she understands and the American people need to understand the depth of feeling across party lines in Israel, and that 70 years after the Holocaust, they believe an Iranian nuclear weapon is a genuine existential threat to Israel.

2. As she said in her statement, she will give all our allies in the region all the means, including military means, to defend themselves.

3. The US will be willing to discuss a public pledge with Israel and our Arab allies, in which Iran would be told any attack against them would be seen as an attack against the US, and as with Article 5 of NATO and our commitment to Japan, we would act accordingly with the full force of our resources.

Jake, at his initiative, Secretary of Energy Moniz gave me a 35 minute telephonic briefing on the agreement, and invited me to meet with him personally this week. There is one element of the briefing about which I was deeply troubled. I do not want to put it in writing. Please call (202-549-4454 or 202-549-5776) when you have a minute.

Best wishes,

Stu

Winning the Social Media War on ISIS
There is no war online against ISIS in which the United States can seize victory, because there is no online victory to be seized. Says that when Bill Clinton came along, Democrats were able to change the way they were viewed. Another poll shows what would happen if Biden entered the race, noting that 13% say they would vote for him and 43% of Democrats say they are likely to switch support if Biden runs. -- Report on WSJ story from this morning which said that Wall Street has been opening its wallet for Jeb Bush and HRC. Says that Jeb Bush has received considerable contributions from Goldman Sachs and 7 other big banks and HRC has received 300,000 from employees at the nation's 6 largest banks. Anthony Scaramucci says that we will continue to see an overwhelming amount of money going to both candidates. Scaramucci, who admits to being with Scott Walker, says that the money doesn't matter as much as the ideas. Dagen McDowell says it will be interesting to watch HRC because she has not gone as far as Bernie when talking about regulating Wall Street and the money keeps going to her. Maria Bartiromo says that while HRC is receiving this money, she said in her last speech that she is going to hit Wall Street with more rules. Scaramucci says HRC is saying things but the public doesn't believe her because she's railing on Wall Street right now because of where Bernie is, but she won't stick with that position. McDowell asks if the primary voter will be bothered by that enough to not vote for her, but Scaramucci says no, she will get the nomination. --Stuart Varney comments on Uber being fined in California. Dagen McDowell says that HRC went after Uber in her economic agenda speech. Says HRC didn't name names but she is going right after the sharing sector of the economy. Varney says the government is trying to go after innovation. Points out the Democrats have controlled California for years and now they are turning reactionary against innovation. -- Report on HRC's entitlement plan. Varney says HRC wants universal pre-k. Says she went further because she wants all kids taken care of from birth through age 4. Says that is more than universal pre-k. Guest says HRC is going very far left in the primary but you might see her go further to the center to win the general election. Varney says HRC staked out a leftist position and she specifically said 0-4 year old pre-k. Says it's difficult to take this back. Says she knows it'll be spun to say Republicans don't want kids to go to pre-k. Varney & Company . 2015 07 16,Hillary Clinton,Commentary,National,Varney attacks HRC pre-k plan.mp4

-- Martha MacCallum comments on FEC reports. Notes that HRC raised $45 million and spent more than $18 million. Monica Crowley joins the show and says Trump is gaining traction because he is very rich and, since Obama has been in office, the left has waged war on success and achievement and wealth. Says this country has always been an aspirational country and demonizing the rich goes against our culture and says Trump is unapologetic about his wealth. Doug Shoen says the principle concern people have today is income inequality and Trump is voicing some concerns that the American people have about the game being rigged, such as immigration, but doesn't think Trump will be elected. MacCallum says the Republicans need to pick someone who will win and new poll doesn't show Trump doing well against HRC. Shoen says that while HRC may have had some slippage recently, she is the acknowledged front-runner and her cash haul was respectable. MacCallum reports that HRC raised over $45 million but has already spent 40% of that. Shows poll saying that 66% of people don't think the word honest describes HRC while 31% believe the word describes her somewhat well. Shoen says when HRC has such a diverse field on the Republican side, she is at an advantage because she has so far avoided getting into the fray. -- Report of HRC holding a town hall with voters in New Hampshire and then stumping at a grassroots organizing event. Says that the trip comes at an important time for the campaign after finance report was released yesterday saying that while she is bringing in big money, she is significantly lagging among small, grassroots donors. Paul Steinhauser joins from New Hampshire to comment on Bernie Sanders' increase in popularity. Says that one of the things Sanders has done is consolidate Elizabeth Warren voters, those voters who are not too crazy about HRC. Says HRC still leads in polls and money, but Bernie Sanders leads in enthusiasm. Steinhauser says the Clinton campaign was going to grow to large town halls regardless of what Bernie Sanders is doing. -- Coverage of HRC's profit sharing plan roll-out. Ed Conard says what this is meant to do is connect the success of the 1% with the stagnant wages of the middle class, when in fact there are very different forces at work. Trish Regan says HRC is in a tough spot because Bernie Sanders is moving increasingly to the left and is generating enthusiasm among her base. Richard Fowler says Bernie has been the rising star over the last few months and the plan HRC is rolling out is another way for her to say she is a champion for the middle class. Fowler disagrees and says the idea of companies sharing their wages with workers is a good incentive for workers. Conard says the supply of labor is going to drive the price of labor, so we cannot legislate wage increases without job decreases. -- Report on new poll numbers about HRC's favorability rating. Shows AP-GFK poll which says 39% have a favorable rating of HRC and 49% unfavorable while an ABC-Washington Post poll shows 52% favorable and 45% unfavorable. Larry Sabato joins to discuss poll results. He says don't trust early polling and says regardless of the numbers, HRC has looked defensive, sheltered by her campaign and unwilling to engage, and over time that will have an impact along with controversies surrounding her. Host says HRC has a higher unfavorability than Obama right now. Says Obama's favorability numbers next year are going to be very important. Says HRC is following WJC's untrustworthy/honesty low ratings in 1992. Host says HRC's unfavorability has increased in the last three months. Sabato says things like roping off the press show that HRC campaign staff is making a lot of mistakes, but HRC is nearly guaranteed the nomination. Sabato says HRC's attempt to seem relatable by going to Chipotle and taking the van were ineffective and the storyline that came out of that was she was being kept from real voters because the people she met with were essentially prescreened. Says if you are going to run for president, you take chances every day. Says most of the candidates are going out and meeting with voters who they have no idea what they are going to say, they take questions from the press almost daily, and that is what they are expected to do. Happening Now . 2015 07 15,Hillary Clinton,Commentary,National,Larry Sabato comments on recent polls.mp4

-- Highlights Washington Post poll which shows 52% of Americans viewing HRC favorably vs 45% in May. Mark Murray says HRC brought in an impressive haul of $45 million. Says as far as her poll numbers go, they will go up and down. Says there's so much already baked into HRC, there's so much name recognition and a lot of people already know how they feel about her. Says we just need to wait and see if there has been a big shift, and right now he attributes any change to statistical noise. News Nation . 2015 07 16,Hillary Clinton,Commentary,National,Mark Murray comments on HRC polling.mp4

-- Commentary on Bill Clinton saying he made a mistake with his crime bill. Reporter says HRC has made criminal justice reform a big part of her campaign this time around, but she was right beside WJC in 1994 pushing really hard for this bill. Asks if this is political, but Paul Begala says no, this shift is represented by the conversation going in a different direction. He says nothing is every perfect, but the law did a lot of good things, but this piece of it for non-violent drug offenders was harmful. At This Hour with Berman and Bolduan . 2015 07 16,Hillary Clinton,Commentary,National,Discussion of WJC crime bill apology.mp4

-- Coverage of FEC reports. Reporter says the GOP field combined is bringing in four times more money than the Clinton Cash machine. Says HRC is bringing in money from the big donors and lobbyists, but she can still really improve with small, grassroots donors. Says that's where Bernie Sanders is beating everyone, and that's where Obama was beating HRC in 2008. Says those are the people who vote for you. Cavuto: Coast to Coast. 2015 07 16,Hillary Clinton,Commentary,National,Commentary on HRC FEC Report.mp4

-- Report of Jeb Bush taking an Uber today. Reporter says this is just days after HRC took a swing at the sharing economy during her economic agenda speech. Host says this is a microcosm for big government vs. small government. Closing Bell . 2015 07 16,Hillary Clinton,Commentary,National,Commentary on Jeb Bush taking an Uber.mp4

-- Report on new poll of Democratic voters show Bernie Sanders making gains on HRC. Notes that HRC is down 9 points since April. Kirsten Powers says it's very early and we have to take it with a grain of salt. Says Bernie Sanders' and Donald Trump's popularity show that people are looking for someone who is not the standard politician. Other panelist says HRC has tremendous name recognition but can still only get 51%. Sandra Smith asks what will happen to HRC if Biden jumps into the race. Host says that HRC is most likely to get the nomination because she has most of the super delegates behind her. Says HRC has supporters on Wall Street at Goldman and Larry Fink has Cheryl Mills on his board so there is a lot of Wall Street guys who like HRC but people on Wall Street are terrified of Donald Trump right now. -- Reporter says it was clear that HRC was going to rake in the most cash on the Democratic side. Says not including outside groups, she brought in over $45 million. Says Bernie Sanders' numbers are more interesting because there is momentum behind his campaign which can be seen in the number of grassroots supporters he has, which is something that HRC is lacking.Bloomberg Markets . 2015 07 16,Hillary Clinton,Commentary,National,Commentary on FEC reports.mp4

-- Report on HRC's fundraising numbers. Says that Elon Musk is one of the donors as well as Steven Spielberg, Sheryl Sandberg, and Jeffrey Katzenberg are among the biggest donors of her campaign in the last quarter. Mark Crumpton joins the show and notes that Sheryl Sandberg told Bloomberg in April that she would like to see HRC as president. Says these donors are not surprising since Hollywood and Silicon Valley tend to go Democrat. Host says this is good evidence for Republicans who say HRC is out of touch with the general public and mixes among the elites. Spanish:

-- Report on Univision poll of Hispanic voters. Bipartisan poll of 1,400 registered Hispanic voters. Said that if the election were held today, HRC would win with 64% of the vote, with Jeb Bush being the runner-up with 27% of the vote. If the Republican primary were held today, Bush would win with 40% of the vote, followed by Rubio with 22% and Cruz with 8%. "Interestingly," 68% of those polled didn't care if a candidate speaks Spanish. Asked about Donald Trump's comments on Mexican immigrants, "their rejection was overwhelming." Showed a clip of Trump's comments in his launch speech and says that those comments are "still fresh in the memories of many Hispanic voters"--79% said his comments were offensive. Then cuts to one of the people who conducted the poll that found that there was no difference in the perception of those comments between Mexicans and Hispanics of other nationalities in finding Trump's comments offensive. Shows Republican Florida Congressman Diaz-Balart who says that he recognizes that Trump's comments aren't helping Republicans but that he'll never actually become the candidate. The poll showed that only 14% of voters think that Trump's comments represent the GOP's beliefs, and 61% believe it represents only Trump's views. One of the Democratic analysts still doesn't think that it will be easy for Republicans to disassociate themselves from Trump if he gets so much support in states. 74% of those polled also supported corporate decisions to cut off relations with Trump. -- Report on Jeb Bush coming to San Francisco and HRC performance on polls. Said he will be visiting the company Thumbtack to highlight innovative companies. Then says that "a poll reveals that each time there are less people that support presidential candidate Hillary Clinton." Said that a poll showed that 39% of voters said they were in favor of Clinton while 50% said the opposite. CHUCK TODD: let me start with one of the issues that's likely to come up tonight at the debate, that's the issue of gun safety. last night in what the clinton campaign is referring to as a debate-eve conversion you came out in favor of essentially repealing immunity for gun manufacturers when it comes to being held liable for gun deaths. that's a switch of your positions. what brought you to this conclusion?

BERNIE SANDERS: well, not really. you know, i understand that secretary clinton and her campaign understand that, you know, they're losing ground. we've started this campaign off 359% in the poll at 3% in the polls, we're closing in in iowa and we're ahead in new hampshire. so i sense in the next few weeks you'll see more --

CHUCK TODD: but you did change your position on this.

BERNIE SANDERS: what i said several months ago, having a d-minus voting record from the nra, voting to ban assault weapons in 1988, yeah, that was a piece of legislation i wanted to relook at. but what that legislation had is a prohibition on armor-piercing bullets, it had language for a child lock safety for our kids, important provision. there were things i do not like and i was willing to rethink. we have rethought it. there's a bill apparently being introduced, i like that bill, it makes good changes and we will be supportive of it.

CHUCK TODD: another thing that will come up on the issue of gun safety is the issue of a waiting period. the clinton campaign is hitting you on not being supportive of something longer like a five day or seven day window and the reason this is being brought up is if dylann roof, the man who killed those nine folks in charleston last year, if there had been a longer waiting period he might have been prevented from buying a gun.

BERNIE SANDERS: look, what we saw in charleston is a tragedy of unspeakable dimensions. i did some pray a guy did prayer with people then takes out a gun and shoots nine people. i believe very strongly in instant background checks. i think we have to expand it and make sure 100% that we keep guns out of the hands of people who should not have that, people with criminal backgrounds, people who are mentally unstable. that has been my view from day one. but you know, chuck, i think the reason the clinton campaign is getting defense sieve they see that we have the momentum. they see the issues we are talking about, a disappearing middle-class and new income and going to the top 1%, a corrupt campaign finance system where people like secretary clinton can raise millions of dollars through super pacs, those are the issues they don't want to discuss so tonight we're going to be discussing a lot of issues and the main issues is why the rich get richer, almost everybody else gets poorer and the fact that we have got to stand up to the billionaire class and change those dynamics.

CHUCK TODD: so you're in in favor of a longer background check? a five, seven-day background check?

BERNIE SANDERS: we are willing to look at anything that makes sense, that keeps guns out of the hands of people who should not have them. but i'm not going to be defensive on that issue. i lost an election in 1988, probably lost an election because i had the courage back then to say assault weapons should not be sold in america.

CHUCK TODD: let me ask you quickly about the iran deal. is iran still an enemy of the united states given what's going on? the improved diplomatic relations?

BERNIE SANDERS: it's funny. if you think back to 2007 during the campaign in which secretary clinton ran against barack obama she was critical of him, a question was asked to obama and said "would you sit down and talk to the iranians?" and he said "yeah, i would." point bag in you talk to your adversaries, you don't run away from that. secretary clinton i think called him naive. turns out that obama was right so clearly we have many, many issues and many concerns with iran but clearly also we want to improve our relationship with this very powerful country. i think the agreement to make certain iran does not get a nuclear weapon was a huge step forward. the fact we have the prisoner release was a good important step forward. so i hope we can continue to go forward to improve relations with iran.

CHUCK TODD: senator sanders, i'll leave it there. we'll look forward to seeing you, secretary clinton and martin o'malley on stage on nbc thank you, sir. it's going to be a humdinger of a debate. you heard senator sanders there mentioned hillary clinton in almost every single answer.

Background details

- Charlie Crist
    - are you ready for a McCain victory? we got 12 days, you know what to do. GOTV. vote for john mccain and sarah mccai-- sarah palin! honor to intro you to small business man, thats right, a wonderful guy - bob builds boats here in Sarasota
- Bob Long
    - wow, this is exciting. i bet theres a lot of Joe The Plumbers here - its great to be part of a Joe The Plumber tour - i have a lot in common w/ him, also differences - 1 is last name. his is wurzebaker, a long name. mine is "long," a short name. hes a plumber, im a boat builder. difference is he was concerned what would happen to his tax rate if he were to buy his co. he was told he'd be taxed to spread the wealth.
    - the diff is i have already experienced what happens to a business when additional taxes are imposed on a company.
    - facts: most of you have probably heard of Welcraft Marine - i was president for 17 yrs. we were quite successful. in early 90s, congress passed a luxury tax. it backfired. it didnt work. it devastated the boat business. thousands lost jobs, companies shut down. and the entire amount of money they raised before they repealed it was less than Welcraft paid in fed taxes in 1 yr. it stymied growth. Congress came to senses and repealed the tax. but it was too late for me, i had lost my job. i had 6 kids, 4 in college. i started a new company, Marine Concepts. we're doing ok, making some margins, but we're very concerned about obama's plan.

  - obama thinks $250k is enough, but an S-corp is taxed as an individual. we cant afford additional taxes. if they taxed more so govt could spread the wealth, it smacks of socialism. [they're lying to us!] itd result in job loss
  - at my company now, we give good benefits. we dont need his plan to take away our money and try to spread it around
  - good news: we have GOP candidate who is totally against tax increases. he's constantly, continually voted against them. he believes in less taxes and spending by govt
  - besides being ready to lead, he supports free enterprise and small business. he'll cut taxes, reduce spending and lead country to new heights.
  - im extremely proud and honored to intro next president, sen. john mccain

- Cindy McCain also on stage

Speech Highlights

TY bob. TY. [crowd cheers] TY bob the boat builder! can i say TY to great gov. Crist, a great man and a great leader? he believes in lower taxes, less spending, giving you bakc your money and restoring economy. behind me is person who will make great FLOTUS, cindy mccain. Cindy says when she speaks we and the palins are proud to have 3 sons in active duty of military. TY. and how about Sarah palin, huh? [cheers] can you believe how shes being attacked? its remarkable. most popular gov. in america, negotiated $40B pipeline project. shes been mayor, gov, city council, shes a reformer, and i can hardly wait. shes far more qualified than joe the Biden.

wonderful to be back in FL. part of my time in Navy and some of best memories were spent serving Navy in FL.

some ST: we need to win FL on nov 4 and w/ your help we're gonna win FL.TY, marine mom. Thank all of you.

could i ask our vets and their fams to raise their hands? TY!

heard a lot of words, after months of campaign trail eloquence, we've finally learned obama's econ. goal: he wants to spread the wealth around. he believes in redistributing wealth not in policies that grow jobs and economy.

he may say he's gonna soak the rich, its the middle class thats gonna get wet.

to pay for $1T of new spending, his tax incr would affect 50% small business owners and affect 16M who employed by them. can i ask small business owners to raise hands?

our econ in trouble. weve lost over 700k jobs, but 300k have been created by small businesss. we shouldnt be taxing small businesses more as obama wants to do. we need to help them expand busienss and create jobs. these ppl have obtained dream Joe The Plumber wants. Obama wants to spread their wealth around. exactly the wrong approach in econ. slowdown. just today we receievd news that jobless claims increased by 15k. his plan would put more ppl out of work. the answer is not higher taxes, but thats exaclty whatll happen if Dems have total control of Cong. we wont let that happen.

we've already seen outline of their plans: tax and spend. chair of important committee said theyre gonna concentrate on incr'ing spending and there are a lot of very rich ppl we can tax. really?? w/ pelosi, reid and obama, recipe for tax and spend.

plan they passed this yr w/ obamas help called for raising taxes on ppl making just $42k. no wonder he thinks there are a lot of really rich ppl out there, everyone is rich when $42k is your standard.

we learned obama's plan is like welfare, so he added a work requirement. 13 days before election. b/c american ppl didnt like his plan. he'll say anything to get elected.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

he's more concerned about using taxes to spread the welath than creating policies to grow economy. our tax plan is real thing, we'll double child deduction, cut cap gains, keep american businesses in america.

as joe and small business owners across country have reminded us, america hasnt become greatest nation by giving money to govt to spread the wealth around, we spread opportunities to those who create jobs.

you know the next pres wont have time to get used to the office. many challenges at home and aborad. this weekend, biden guaranteed if obama is elected, we will have internatl criss

Next president wont have time to get used to office. Lots of challenges. Ill bring troops home in honor and victory ,not in defeat. Obama woud have them come home in defeat [someone yells "un-american!"]

Biden crisis. We don't want a president that invites crisis. Obama tried to explain this away saying it was a "rhetorical flourish" - really? really? what he means i Biden accidently delivered some straight talk to America.

Biden referred to how jack Kennedy was tested in crisis. I had a little personal experience with that. i was a navy pilot on USS enterprise and I was ready to go to nuclear war. I know how close we came to nuclear war. i will not be a president that needs to be tested. I have been tested, he has not.

it shows in the way we respond to tests. Obama told camp donors that when crisis hits, they would have to stand with him b/c it wouldnt be apparent that obama would have right response. forget apparent. We know he wont have the right response.

obama says if you want to know how he'll respond, look at what he's done in his campaign. his campaign? We've seen the wrong response over and over. he was against surge. ill bring our troops home but ill bring them home in honor not defeat.

he said he'd sit down unconditional with world's worst dictators, including castro brothers. when russia invaded georgia, he said the invaded country should show restraint. He's been wrong on all these things.

we cant spend next 4 yrs as we have the last 8, waiting for our luck change. We need a new direction and we have to fight for it.

I've been fighting for this country since 17 and have scar to prove it. if im elected pres, I'll fight to shake up Washington and take america in new direction from my first day in office until my last. I'm not afraid of the fight, im ready for it.

i'm Not gonna spend 750 billion to bailout WS bankers and brokers who got us into this mess. ill make sure we take care of the working ppl who were devastated by excessed of WS and DC. we all know what triggered this mess: Sub prime crisis. we have to protect the value of your home. Buy mortgages, refinance so ppl can stay in home. Realize the American dream, keep people in their homes. lets stop taking care of WS and take care of the homeowners, let them i have plan to let retirees and those nearing it keep their money invested so they dont lose their savings.

Raising taxes makes bad economy worse. keeping taxes low creates jobs. obama wants to raise your taxes to pay for $1T in new spending.

Explosion of gov spending over the last 8 yrs has put us into debt to foreign countries that don't like us. it weakened the dollar. I wont spend more of your money, Obama will and he want without taxing or debt. Government will live on budget like you. Ill freeze government spending on all but most important programs like defense, vet care, SS and HC until we scrub every govt program and get rid of the ones not working. Ill veto every single pork barrel and you'll know their names. 1 million a day in pork for Obama. You need jobs.

if im--when i'm elected presidnet, I wont make it harder to sell our goods overseas. ill open new mkts for goods made in america and Make sure trade is free and fair. Obama wants to raise taxes. Last time – depression.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

those who dont learn History lessons are doomed to repeat, i know my history and I wont make the same mistake Obama seeks to repeat.

when I'm elected, we'll stop spending 750B to pay countries that dont like us very much.

I acknowledge Obamas eloquence, he said he would "consider" off shore drilling. We'll drill here and drill now. you need to get a lot more of those revenues to stay in FL if we're gonna drill offshore the state. You deserve it.

obama wants to delay drilling and opposes new nucl pwr plants. we'll Invest in all alternatives. Manufacture of hybrid, flex fuel and electric cars. we'll invest in clean coal tech. we'll lower the costs within months and Create millions of new jobs in america.

Straight talk – less than 2 wks. . America needs a fighter, who puts all cards on table. I have fought for you most of life. there are other ways to love this country but ive never been one to do it from the sidelines. I know you're worried. America is great but we are at a moment of national crisis that will determine our future.

Will we continue to lead the world's economies or will we be overtaken? Will the world become safer or more dangerous? Will our military remain the strongest in the world? Will our children and grandchildren's future be brighter than ours?

My answer to you is yes. Yes, we will lead. Yes, we will prosper. Yes, we will be safer. Yes, we will pass on to our children a stronger, better country. But we must be prepared to act swiftly, boldly, with courage and wisdom.

I am an American and I choose to fight.
Don't give up hope. Be strong. Have courage. And fight.

Fight for a new direction for our country. Fight for what's right for America.

Fight to clean up the mess of corruption, infighting and selfishness in Washington.

Fight to get our economy out of the ditch and back in the lead.

Fight for the ideals and character of a free people.

Fight for our children's future.

Fight for justice and opportunity for all.

Stand up to defend our country from its enemies.

Stand up, stand up, stand up and fight. America is worth fighting for. Nothing is inevitable here. We never give up. We never quit. We never hide from history. We make history.

Now, let's go win this election and get this country moving again.

TY and god bless you and god bless the united states of America. I need your help. Thank you and god bless…

On the world stage, this president will have to work with foreign leaders in dealing with ISIS and other terrorists, climate change, the containment of nuclear threats posed in North Korea and Iran, the Russian incursions in Ukraine and foreign trade.

The presidency is not an entry-level position. Whoever is sworn into office next January must demonstrate not only a deep understanding of the issues facing America, but also possess the diplomatic skills that enable presidents to forge alliances to get things done.

By that measure, Democrats have one outstanding candidate deserving of their support: Hillary Clinton. No other candidate can match the depth or breadth of her knowledge and experience.

As first lady, she worked tirelessly on health care reform and, with bipartisan support, created the Children's Health Insurance Programthat provides coverage for 8 million children.

As a senator, she reached across party lines and joined forces with conservatives, including Sen. Lindsey Graham and former House Speaker Newt Gingrich, to fight for job creation and universal health care.

ENDORSEMENT: Marco Rubio can chart new direction for GOP

NASH: Register faced tough decision in endorsements

RELATED:A history of Register caucus endorsements

As secretary of state, she helped secure international sanctions against Iran and redefined her job by expanding America's diplomatic agenda to include poverty, women's rights, the environment and other issues.

She is not a perfect candidate, as evidenced the way she has handled the furor over her private email server. In our endorsement of her 2008 campaign for president, we wrote that "when she makes a mistake, she should just say so." That appears to be a lesson she has yet to fully embrace.

Her changing stance on gay marriage, immigration and other issues has invited accusations that she is guided less by personal conviction than by political calculations. She refutes that, and argues persuasively that a willingness to change one's thinking on specific issues, while remaining true to what she calls "the same values and principles," is a virtue, one lacking in most politicians.

Over the course of two meetings, Clinton spent more than three hours with the editorial board, answering questions in a direct and forthright manner. She exhibited an impressive command of the issues, though we'd have liked to hear more fromher on the debt and the future of Social Security. She was somewhat prickly and defensive when discussing her emails, but overall she was gracious, engaging and personable.

Her chief opponent for the nomination, Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont, has proven to be an honorable and formidable campaigner, and it's very likely that without him in the race, candidates in both parties wouldn't be discussing America's growing inequality in wealth and income.

Sanders has tapped into the public's anger and frustration with Washington, without demonizing government and resorting to the cheap demagoguery favored by Donald Trump and others. He has shown himself to be a man of courage and principle who has the ability to rally others to his cause.

But Sanders admits that virtually all of his plans for reform have no chance of being approved by a Congress that bears any resemblance to the current crop of federal lawmakers. This is why, he says, voters can't simply elect him president, but must instead spark a "political revolution."

Easier said than done. Congress has the largest Republican majority since the 71st Congress of 1929-31.

A successful Sanders presidency would hinge on his ability to remake Washington in his own image. It's almost inconceivable that such a transformation could take place, even with Democrats controlling both chambers of Congress.

As for Martin O'Malley, the data-driven, wonkish former Maryland governor who has gained little traction in the campaign so far, he seems better suited to a Cabinet-level job in a Clinton White House.

In the final analysis, Iowa Democrats will have to choose between the lofty idealism of Bernie Sanders and the down-to-earth pragmatism of Hillary Clinton. For some, this will be a choice of whether to vote with their hearts or their heads.

Clinton has demonstrated that she is a thoughtful, hardworking public servant who has earned the respect of leaders at home and abroad. She stands ready to take on the most demanding job in the world.

Of course, as we have discussed, she will be supportive. But genuinely the devil is in the details--e.g. What level of inspections of military facilities? What answers to PMDs and access to scientists amd experts? What phasing of sanctions? A modest delay of a day will make clear she is not simply supporting the agreement sight unseen. Also. It will be useful to get the responses of experts like Einhorn and Albright and Samore.

outstanding work that he does. To the congressional delegation of Iowa that is doing outstanding work and to Nancy Pelosi , Madam Speaker, thank you all for the wonderful welcome and the wonderful hospitality.

[Responding to audience] I love you back.

A little less than one year from today, you will go into the voting booth and you will select the President of the United States of America. Now, here's the good news -- the name George W. Bush will not be on the ballot. The name of my cousin Dick Cheney will not be on the ballot. We've been trying to hide that for a long time. Everybody has a black sheep in the family. The era of Scooter Libby justice, and Brownie incompetence, and Karl Rove politics will finally be over.

But the question you're going to have to ask yourself when you caucus in January and you vote in November is, "What's next for America?" We are in a defining moment in our history. Our nation is at war. The planet is in peril. The dream that so many generations fought for feels as if it's slowly slipping away. We are working harder for less. We've never paid more for health care or for college. It's harder to save and it's harder to retire. And most of all we've lost faith that our leaders can or will do anything about it.

We were promised compassionate conservatism and all we got was Katrina and wiretaps. We were promised a uniter, and we got a President who could not even lead the half of the country that voted for him. We were promised a more ethical and more efficient government, and instead we have a town called Washington that is more corrupt and more wasteful than it was before. And the only mission that was ever accomplished is to use fear and falsehood to take this country to a war that should have never been authorized and should have never been waged.

It is because of these failures that America is listening, intently, to what we say here today -- not just Democrats, but Republicans and Independents who've lost trust in their government, but want to believe again.

And it is because of these failures that we not only have a moment of great challenge, but also a moment of great opportunity. We have a chance to bring the country together in a new majority -- to finally tackle problems that George Bush made far worse, but that had festered long before George Bush ever took office -- problems that we've talked about year after year after year after year.

And that is why the same old Washington textbook campaigns just won't do in this election. That's why not answering questions, because we are afraid our answers won't be popular just won't do. That's why telling the American people what we think they want to hear instead of telling the American people what they need to hear just won't do. Triangulating and poll-driven positions because we're worried about what Mitt or Rudy might say about us just won't do. If we are really serious about wining this election Democrats, we can't live in fear of losing it.
This party -- the party of Jefferson and Jackson; of Roosevelt and Kennedy -- has always made the biggest difference in the lives of the American people when we led, not by polls, but by principle; not by calculation, but by conviction; when we summoned the entire nation to a common purpose -- a higher purpose. And I run for the Presidency of the United States of America because that's the party America needs us to be right now.

A party that offers not just a difference in policies, but a difference in leadership.

A party that doesn't just focus on how to win but why we should. A party that doesn't just offer change as a slogan, but real, meaningful change -- change that America can believe in. That's why I'm in this race. That's why I am running for the Presidency of the United States of America -- to offer change that we can believe in.

I am in this race to tell the corporate lobbyists that their days of setting the agenda in Washington are over. I have done more than any other candidate in this race to take on lobbyists -- and won. They have not funded my campaign, they will not get a job in my White House, and they will not drown out the voices of the American people when I am President. I'm in this race to take those tax breaks away from companies that are moving jobs overseas and put them in the pockets of hard working Americans who deserve it. And I won't raise the minimum wage every ten years -- I will raise it to keep pace so that workers don't' fall behind.

That is why I am in it. To protect the American worker. To fight for the American worker.
I'm in this race because I want to stop talking about the outrage of 47 million Americans without health care and start actually doing something about it. I expanded health care in Illinois by bringing Democrats and Republicans together. By taking on the insurance industry. And that is how I will make certain that every single American in this country has health care they can count on and I won't do it twenty years from now, I won't do it ten years from now, I will do it by the end of my first term as President of the United States of America.

I run for president to make sure that every American child has the best education that we have to offer -- from the day they are born to the day they graduate from college. And I won't just talk about how great teachers are -- as President I will reward them for their greatness -- by raising salaries and giving them more support. That's why I'm in this race.

I am running for President because I am sick and tired of democrats thinking that the only way to look tough on national security is by talking, and acting, and voting like George Bush Republicans.

When I am this party's nominee, my opponent will not be able to say that I voted for the war in Iraq; or that I gave George Bush the benefit of the doubt on Iran; or that I supported Bush-Cheney policies of not talking to leaders that we don't like. And he will not be able to say that I wavered on something as fundamental as whether or not it is ok for America to torture -- because it is never ok. That's why I am in it.

As President, I will end the war in Iraq. We will have our troops home in sixteen months. I will close Guantanamo. I will restore habeas corpus. I will finish the fight against Al Qaeda. And I will lead the world to combat the common threats of the 21st century -- nuclear weapons and terrorism; climate change and poverty; genocide and disease. And I will send once more a message to those yearning faces beyond our shores that says, "You matter to us. Your future is our future. And our moment is now."

America, our moment is now.

Our moment is now.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I don't want to spend the next year or the next four years re-fighting the same fights that we had in the 1990s.

I don't want to pit Red America against Blue America, I want to be the President of the United States of America.

And if those Republicans come at me with the same fear-mongering and swift-boating that they usually do, then I will take them head on. Because I believe the American people are tired of fear and tired of distractions and tired of diversions. We can make this election not about fear, but about the future. And that won't just be a Democratic victory; that will be an American victory.

And that is a victory America needs right now.

I am not in this race to fulfill some long-held ambitions or because I believe it's somehow owed to me. I never expected to be here, I always knew this journey was improbable. I've never been on a journey that wasn't.

I am running in this race because of what Dr. King called "the fierce urgency of now." Because I believe that there's such a thing as being too late. And that hour is almost upon us.

I don't want to wake up four years from now and find out that millions of Americans still lack health care because we couldn't take on the insurance industry.

I don't want to see that the oceans have risen a few more inches. The planet has reached a point of no return because we couldn't find a way to stop buying oil from dictators.

I don't want to see more American lives put at risk because no one had the judgment or the courage to stand up against a misguided war before we sent our troops into fight.

I don't want to see homeless veterans on the streets. I don't want to send another generation of American children to failing schools. I don't want that future for my daughters. I don't want that future for your sons. I do not want that future for America.

I'm in this race for the same reason that I fought for jobs for the jobless and hope for the hopeless on the streets of Chicago; for the same reason I fought for justice and equality as a civil rights lawyer; for the same reason that I fought for Illinois families for over a decade.

Because I will never forget that the only reason that I'm standing here today is because somebody, somewhere stood up for me when it was risky. Stood up when it was hard. Stood up when it wasn't popular. And because that somebody stood up, a few more stood up. And then a few thousand stood up. And then a few million stood up. And standing up, with courage and clear purpose, they somehow managed to change the world.

That's why I'm running, Iowa -- to give our children and grandchildren the same chances somebody gave me.

That's why I'm running, Democrats -- to keep the American Dream alive for those who still hunger for opportunity, who still thirst for equality.

That's why I'm asking you to stand with me, that's why I'm asking you to caucus for me, that's why I am asking you to stop settling for what the cynics say we have to accept. In this election -- in this moment -- let us reach for what we know is possible. A nation healed. A world repaired. An America that believes again. Thank you very much everybody.

We were promised compassionate conservatism and all we got was Katrina and wiretaps. We were promised a uniter, and we got a President who could not even lead the half of the country that voted for him. We were promised a more ethical and more efficient government, and instead we have a town called Washington that is more corrupt and more wasteful than it was before. And the only mission that was ever accomplished is to use fear and falsehood to take this country to a war that should have never been authorized and should have never been waged.

It is because of these failures that America is listening, intently, to what we say here today -- not just Democrats, but Republicans and Independents who've lost trust in their government, but want to believe again.

And it is because of these failures that we not only have a moment of great challenge, but also a moment of great opportunity. We have a chance to bring the country together in a new majority -- to finally tackle problems that George Bush made far worse, but that had festered long before George Bush ever took office -- problems that we've talked about year after year after year after year.

And that is why the same old Washington textbook campaigns just won't do in this election. That's why not answering questions, because we are afraid our answers won't be popular just won't do. That's why telling the American people what we think they want to hear instead of telling the American people what they need to hear just won't do. Triangulating and poll-driven positions because we're worried about what Mitt or Rudy might say about us just won't do. If we are really serious about wining this election Democrats, we can't live in fear of losing it.
This party -- the party of Jefferson and Jackson; of Roosevelt and Kennedy -- has always made the biggest difference in the lives of the American people when we led, not by polls, but by principle; not by calculation, but by conviction; when we summoned the entire nation to a common purpose -- a higher purpose. And I run for the Presidency of the United States of America because that's the party America needs us to be right now.

A party that offers not just a difference in policies, but a difference in leadership.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A party that doesn't just focus on how to win but why we should. A party that doesn't just offer change as a slogan, but real, meaningful change -- change that America can believe in. That's why I'm in this race. That's why I am running for the Presidency of the United States of America -- to offer change that we can believe in.

I am in this race to tell the corporate lobbyists that their days of setting the agenda in Washington are over. I have done more than any other candidate in this race to take on lobbyists -- and won. They have not funded my campaign, they will not get a job in my White House, and they will not drown out the voices of the American people when I am President. I'm in this race to take those tax breaks away from companies that are moving jobs overseas and put them in the pockets of hard working Americans who deserve it. And I won't raise the minimum wage every ten years -- I will raise it to keep pace so that workers don't' fall behind.

That is why I am in it. To protect the American worker. To fight for the American worker.
I'm in this race because I want to stop talking about the outrage of 47 million Americans without health care and start actually doing something about it. I expanded health care in Illinois by bringing Democrats and Republicans together. By taking on the insurance industry. And that is how I will make certain that every single American in this country has health care they can count on and I won't do it twenty years from now, I won't do it ten years from now, I will do it by the end of my first term as President of the United States of America.

I run for president to make sure that every American child has the best education that we have to offer -- from the day they are born to the day they graduate from college. And I won't just talk about how great teachers are -- as President I will reward them for their greatness -- by raising salaries and giving them more support. That's why I'm in this race.

I am running for President because I am sick and tired of democrats thinking that the only way to look tough on national security is by talking, and acting, and voting like George Bush Republicans.

When I am this party's nominee, my opponent will not be able to say that I voted for the war in Iraq; or that I gave George Bush the benefit of the doubt on Iran; or that I supported Bush-Cheney policies of not talking to leaders that we don't like. And he will not be able to say that I wavered on something as fundamental as whether or not it is ok for America to torture -- because it is never ok. That's why I am in it.

As President, I will end the war in Iraq. We will have our troops home in sixteen months. I will close Guantanamo. I will restore habeas corpus. I will finish the fight against Al Qaeda. And I will lead the world to combat the common threats of the 21st century -- nuclear weapons and terrorism; climate change and poverty; genocide and disease. And I will send once more a message to those yearning faces beyond our shores that says, "You matter to us. Your future is our future. And our moment is now."

America, our moment is now.

Our moment is now.

I don't want to spend the next year or the next four years re-fighting the same fights that we had in the 1990s.

I don't want to pit Red America against Blue America, I want to be the President of the United States of America.

And if those Republicans come at me with the same fear-mongering and swift-boating that they usually do, then I will take them head on. Because I believe the American people are tired of fear and tired of distractions and tired of diversions. We can make this election not about fear, but about the future. And that won't just be a Democratic victory; that will be an American victory.

And that is a victory America needs right now.

I am not in this race to fulfill some long-held ambitions or because I believe it's somehow owed to me. I never expected to be here, I always knew this journey was improbable. I've never been on a journey that wasn't.

I am running in this race because of what Dr. King called "the fierce urgency of now." Because I believe that there's such a thing as being too late. And that hour is almost upon us.

I don't want to wake up four years from now and find out that millions of Americans still lack health care because we couldn't take on the insurance industry.

I don't want to see that the oceans have risen a few more inches. The planet has reached a point of no return because we couldn't find a way to stop buying oil from dictators.

I don't want to see more American lives put at risk because no one had the judgment or the courage to stand up against a misguided war before we sent our troops into fight.

I don't want to see homeless veterans on the streets. I don't want to send another generation of American children to failing schools. I don't want that future for my daughters. I don't want that future for your sons. I do not want that future for America.

I'm in this race for the same reason that I fought for jobs for the jobless and hope for the hopeless on the streets of Chicago; for the same reason I fought for justice and equality as a civil rights lawyer; for the same reason that I fought for Illinois families for over a decade.

Because I will never forget that the only reason that I'm standing here today is because somebody, somewhere stood up for me when it was risky. Stood up when it was hard. Stood up when it wasn't popular. And because that somebody stood up, a few more stood up. And then a few thousand stood up. And then a few million stood up. And standing up, with courage and clear purpose, they somehow managed to change the world.

That's why I'm running, Iowa -- to give our children and grandchildren the same chances somebody gave me.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

That's why I'm running, Democrats -- to keep the American Dream alive for those who still hunger for opportunity, who still thirst for equality.

That's why I'm asking you to stand with me, that's why I'm asking you to caucus for me, that's why I am asking you to stop settling for what the cynics say we have to accept. In this election -- in this moment -- let us reach for what we know is possible. A nation healed. A world repaired. An America that believes again. Thank you very much everybody.

Hello Big Campaign,

Just off the phone with our tracker Greg who made it into today's event. Below are the notes from our call.

BIG Highlights: Anti-war demonstrators interrupt McCain's prepared remarks FOUR times (video clips available upon request; the files are too large to send over the google-group)

Denver, CO: McCain Speech on Nuclear Security

Background Details:
- Approximately 350 people in the audience; diverse crowd
- Tracker had no difficulty gaining entry
- Usual press in attendance - traveling national press and local affiliates; Fox News broadcast the event live
- Approximately 12 demonstrators outside of event; some carried signs for Hillary Clinton, others carried signs about chronic disease; unfortunately, tracker did not see any signs directly targeting McCain
- Two people came on stage with McCain -- 1) Greg McFay(sp) gave opening remarks and introduced Brown 2) former Senator Hank Brown gave remarks and then introduced McCain
- Former Senator Brown talked about McCain's foreign policy credentials; told story about how McCain had concerns going into Lebanon in the '80s because there were not clear goals and as a result, McCain voted against war; talked about Vietnam -- and how McCain has fought for normalizing relations with Vietnam; also said John is very careful about sending our troops into battle

Remarks By John McCain on Nuclear Security
May 27, 2008

ARLINGTON, VA -- U.S. Senator John McCain delivered the following remarks as prepared for delivery at the University of Denver in Denver, Colorado, today at 10:00 a.m. MDT (12:00 p.m. EDT):
For much of our history, the world considered the United States a young country. Today, we are the world's oldest constitutional democracy, yet we remain a young nation. We still possess the attributes of youth -- spirit, energy, vitality, and creativity. America will always be young as long as we are looking forward, and leading, to a better world.

Innovative and energetic American leadership is as vital to the world's future today as it was during the Cold War. I have spent my life in public service working to ensure our great nation is strong enough to counter those who wish us ill. To be an effective leader in the 21st century, however, it is not enough to be strong. We must be a model for others. That means not only pursuing our own interests but recognizing that we share interests with peoples across our planet. There is such a thing as good international citizenship, and America must be a good citizen of the world—leading the way to address the danger of global warming and preserve our environment, strengthening existing international institutions and helping to build new ones, and engaging the world in a broad dialogue on the threat of violent extremists, who would, if they could, use weapons of mass destruction to attack us and our allies.

MCCAIN interrupted for the FIRST time by anti-war demonstrators during the paragraph above. Demonstrators were shouting, 'Support the troops, End the war.'

Today we also need to apply our spirit of optimism, energy, and innovation to a crisis that has been building for decades but is now coming to a head: the global spread of nuclear weapons. Forty-five years ago, President John F. Kennedy asked the American people to imagine what the world would look like if nuclear weapons spread beyond the few powers that then held them to the many other nations that sought them. "Stop and think for a moment," he said, "what it would mean to have nuclear weapons in so many hands, in the hands of countries large and small, stable and unstable, responsible and irresponsible, scattered throughout the world." If that happened, he warned, "there would be no rest for anyone."

MCCAIN interrupted for the SECOND time by anti-war demonstrators during the paragraph above. Demonstrators were two young people shouting, 'End this war. End this war.' Demonstrators were removed from the event. At this point, McCain stopped the speech to say that he went to town halls all the time where people share their views, but people always respected the idea of not interfering with other people's right to free speech.

Kennedy's warning resonates more today than ever before. North Korea pursues a nuclear weapons program to the point where, today, the dictator Kim Jong-Il has tested a nuclear weapon, and almost certainly possesses several more nuclear warheads. And it has shared its nuclear and missile know-how with others, including Syria. It is a vital national interest for the North Korean nuclear program to be completely, verifiably and irreversibly ended. Likewise, we have seen Iran marching with single-minded determination toward the same goal. President Ahmadinejad has threatened to wipe Israel off the face of the earth, and represents a threat to every country in the region – one we cannot ignore or minimize.

MCCAIN interrupted for the THIRD time by anti-war demonstrators during the paragraph above. Demonstrators were a man and a woman asking about the war in Iraq. They were soon removed from the event. McCain grew notably irritated by this third interruption. He responded by saying, 'I will never surrender in Iraq my friends. Our American soldiers will come home with honor.' (not exact quote)

Other nations have begun to wonder whether they, too, need to have such weapons, if only in self-defense. As a result, we could find ourselves in a world where a dozen or more nations, small and large, stable and unstable, responsible and irresponsible, have viable nuclear weapons programs. But there is a flip side to President Kennedy's warning. We should stop and think for a moment not only of the perils of a world awash with nuclear weapons, but also of the more hopeful alternative – a world in which there are far fewer such weapons than there are today, and in which proliferation, instability, and nuclear terrorism are far less likely. This is the world it is our responsibility to build.

There is no simple answer to the problem. If you look back over the past two decades, I don't think any of us, Republican or Democrat, can take much satisfaction in what we've accomplished to control nuclear proliferation. Today, some people seem to think they've discovered a brand new cause, something no one before them ever thought of. Many believe all we need to do to end the nuclear programs of hostile governments is have our president talk with leaders in Pyongyang and Tehran, as if we haven't tried talking to these governments repeatedly over the past two decades. Others think military action alone can achieve our goals, as if military actions were not fraught with their own terrible risks. While the use of force may be necessary, it can only be as a last resort not a first step. The truth is we will only address the terrible prospect of the worldwide spread of nuclear arms if we transcend our partisan differences, combine our energies, learn from our past mistakes, and seek practical and effective solutions.

MCCAIN interrupted for the FOURTH time by anti-war demonstrators during the paragraph above. The main demonstrator was a gentleman asking about Iraq.

I'd like to suggest some steps we should take to chart a common vision for the future. It is a vision in which the United States returns to a tradition of innovative thinking, broad-minded internationalism, and determined diplomacy, backed by America's great and enduring power to lead. It is a vision not of the United States acting alone, but building and participating in a community of nations all drawn together in this vital common purpose. It is a vision of a responsible America, dedicated to an enduring peace based on freedom.

A quarter of a century ago, President Ronald Reagan declared, "our dream is to see the day when nuclear weapons will be banished from the face of the Earth." That is my dream, too. It is a distant and difficult goal. And we must proceed toward it prudently and pragmatically, and with a focused concern for our security and the security of allies who depend on us. But the Cold War ended almost twenty years ago, and the time has come to take further measures to reduce dramatically the number of nuclear weapons in the world's arsenals. It is time for the United States to show the kind of leadership the world expects from us, in the tradition of American presidents who worked to reduce the nuclear threat to mankind.

Our highest priority must be to reduce the danger that nuclear weapons will ever be used. Such weapons, while still important to deter an attack with weapons of mass destruction against us and our allies, represent the most abhorrent and indiscriminate form of warfare known to man. We do, quite literally, possess the means to destroy all of mankind. We must seek to do all we can to ensure that nuclear weapons will never again be used.

While working closely with allies who rely on our nuclear umbrella for their security, I would ask the Joint Chiefs of Staff to engage in a comprehensive review of all aspects of our nuclear strategy and policy. I would keep an open mind on all responsible proposals. At the same time, we must continue to deploy a safe and reliable nuclear deterrent, robust missile defenses and superior conventional forces that are capable of defending the United States and our allies. But I will seek to reduce the size of our nuclear arsenal to the lowest number possible consistent with our security requirements and global commitments. Today we deploy thousands of nuclear warheads. It is my hope to move as rapidly as possible to a significantly smaller force.

While we have serious differences, with the end of the Cold War, Russia and the United States are no longer mortal enemies. As our two countries possess the overwhelming majority of the world's nuclear weapons, we have a special responsibility to reduce their number. I believe we should reduce our nuclear forces to the lowest level we judge necessary, and we should be prepared to enter into a new arms control agreement with Russia reflecting the nuclear reductions I will seek. Further, we should be able to agree with Russia on binding verification measures based on those currently in effect under the START Agreement, to enhance confidence and transparency. In close consultation with our allies, I would also like to explore ways we and Russia can reduce – and hopefully eliminate – deployments of tactical nuclear weapons in Europe. I also believe we should work with Russia to build confidence in our missile defense program, including through such initiatives as the sharing of early warning data and prior notification of missile launches.

There are other areas in which we can work in partnership with Russia to strengthen protections against weapons of mass destruction. I would seriously consider Russia's recent proposal to work together to globalize the Intermediate Range Nuclear Forces Treaty. I would also redouble our common efforts to reduce the risk that nuclear, chemical, or biological weapons may fall into the hands of terrorists or unfriendly governments.

I believe we should also begin a dialogue with China on strategic and nuclear issues. We have important shared interests with China and should begin discussing ways to achieve the greatest possible transparency and cooperation on nuclear force structure and doctrine. We should work with China to encourage conformity with the practices of the other four nuclear weapon states recognized in the Non-Proliferation Treaty, including working toward nuclear arsenal reductions and toward a moratorium on the production of additional fissile material.

I believe we must also address nuclear testing. As president I will pledge to continue America's current moratorium on testing, but also begin a dialogue with our allies, and with the U.S. Senate, to identify ways we can move forward to limit testing in a verifiable manner that does not undermine the security or viability of our nuclear deterrent. This would include taking another look at the Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty to see what can be done to overcome the shortcomings that prevented it from entering into force. I opposed that treaty in 1999, but said at the time I would keep an open mind about future developments.

I would only support the development of any new type of nuclear weapon that is absolutely essential for the viability of our deterrent, that results in making possible further decreases in the size of our nuclear arsenal, and furthers our global nuclear security goals. I would cancel all further work on the so-called Robust Nuclear Earth Penetrator, a weapon that does not make strategic or political sense.

Finally, we cannot achieve our non-proliferation goals on our own. We must strengthen existing international treaties and institutions to combat proliferation, and develop new ones when necessary. We should move quickly with other nations to negotiate a Fissile Material Cut-off Treaty to end production of the most dangerous nuclear materials. The international community needs to improve its ability to interdict the spread of nuclear weapons and material under the Proliferation Security Initiative. And we need to increase funding for our own non-proliferation efforts, including the Cooperative Threat Reduction programs established by the landmark Nunn-Lugar legislation, and ensure the highest possible standards of security for existing nuclear materials.

In 2010, an international conference will meet to review the Non-Proliferation Treaty. If I am President, I will seize that opportunity to strengthen and enhance all aspects of the non-proliferation regime. We need to strengthen enforcement of the so-called "atoms for peace" bargain by insisting that countries that receive the benefits of peaceful nuclear cooperation must return or dismantle what they receive if they violate or withdraw from the NPT. We need to increase IAEA funding and enhance the intelligence support it receives. We also need to reverse the burden of proof when it comes to discovering whether a nation is cheating on its NPT commitments. The IAEA shouldn't have to play cat-and-mouse games to prove a country is in compliance. It is for suspected violators to prove they are in compliance. We should establish a requirement by the UN Security Council that international transfers of sensitive nuclear technology must be disclosed in advance to an international authority such as the IAEA, and further require that undisclosed transfers be deemed illicit and subject to interdiction. Finally, to enforce treaty obligations, IAEA member states must be willing to impose sanctions on nations that seek to withdraw from it.

We need to enlist all willing partners in the global battle against nuclear proliferation. I support the U.S.-India Civil Nuclear Accord as a means of strengthening our relationship with the world's largest democracy, and further involving India in the fight against proliferation. We should engage actively with both India and Pakistan to improve the security of nuclear stockpiles and weapons materials, and construct a secure global nuclear order that eliminates the likelihood of proliferation and the possibility of nuclear conflict.

As we improve the national and multilateral tools to catch and reverse illicit nuclear programs, I am convinced civilian nuclear energy can be a critical part of our fight against global warming. Civilian nuclear power provides a way for the United States and other responsible nations to achieve energy independence and reduce our dependence on foreign oil and gas. But in order to take advantage of civilian nuclear energy, we must do a better job of ensuring it remains civilian. Some nations use the pretense of civilian nuclear programs as cover for nuclear weapons programs. We need to build an international consensus that exposes this deception, and holds nations accountable for it. We cannot continue allowing nations to enrich and reprocess uranium, ostensibly for civilian purposes, and stand by impotently as they develop weapons programs.

The most effective way to prevent this deception is to limit the further spread of enrichment and reprocessing. To persuade countries to forego enrichment and reprocessing, I would support international guarantees of nuclear fuel supply to countries that renounce enrichment and reprocessing, as well as the establishment of multinational nuclear enrichment centers in which they can participate. Nations that seek nuclear fuel for legitimate civilian purposes will be able to acquire what they need under international supervision. This is one suggestion Russia and others have made to Iran. Unfortunately, the Iranian government has so far rejected this idea. Perhaps with enough outside pressure and encouragement, they can be persuaded to change their minds before it is too late.

I would seek to establish an international repository for spent nuclear fuel that could collect and safely store materials overseas that might otherwise be reprocessed to acquire bomb-grade materials. It is even possible that such an international center could make it unnecessary to open the proposed spent nuclear fuel storage facility at Yucca Mountain in Nevada.

This is a long list of steps we need to take. It is long because there is no single answer to this crisis, and there are no easy answers. It is long because no nation can meet this dire challenge alone and none can be indifferent to its outcome. The United States cannot and will not stop the spread of nuclear weapons by unilateral action. We must lead concerted and persistent multilateral efforts. As powerful as we are, America's ability to defend ourselves and our allies against the threat of nuclear attack depends on our ability to encourage effective international cooperation. We must strengthen the accords and institutions that make such cooperation possible. No problem we face poses a greater threat to us and the world than nuclear proliferation. In a time when followers of a hateful and remorseless ideology are willing to destroy themselves to destroy us, the threat of suicide bombers with the means to wreak incomprehensible devastation should call the entire world to action. The civilized nations of the world must act as one or we will suffer consequences once thought remote when the threat of mutually assured destruction could deter responsible states from thinking the unthinkable.

Americans have always risen to the challenges of their time. And we have always done so successfully not by hiding from history, but by making history; by encouraging a sometimes reluctant world to follow our lead, and defend civilization from old mistakes and old animosities, and the folly of relying on policies that no longer keep us safe. I want to keep the country I love and have served all my life secure in our freedom. I want us to rise to the challenges of our times, as generations before us rose to theirs. It is incumbent on America, more than any other nation on earth, to lead in building the foundations for a stable and enduring peace, a peace built on the strength of our commitment to it, on the transformative ideals on which we were founded, on our ability to see around the corner of history, and on our courage and wisdom to make new and better choices. No matter how dangerous the threats we face in our day, it still remains within our power to make in our time another, better world than we inherited. And that, my friends, is what I am running for President to do.

Thank you.

Donald Trump: I'm Going to Israel

Donald Trump revealed on Wednesday that he's going to take a trip to Israel soon, one day ahead of a conference in Washington where he will address the top Jewish Republicans in the country. Trump was speaking Wednesday night in Manassas, Virginia, where he was asked about his stance on supporting Israel. "Very soon I'm going to Israel…I'm going to be meeting with Bibi Netanyahu." The GOP front-runner said he "love(s)" Israel and will support it whole-heartedly -- and attacked President Barack Obama for not doing enough to support the U.S. ally.

Hizme Terrorist Was Palestinian Authority Intelligence Officer

The Arab terrorist who shot and wounded two Israelis at Hizme checkpoint north of Jerusalem earlier Thursday has been identified as an officer in the Palestinian Authority preventative security service. He was named as Mazen Hassan Aribah from Abu Dis neighborhood in Jerusalem. Aribah was killed by IDF return fire, after opening fire at the checkpoint from the direction of the Arab village of Hizme. Hizme checkpoint is the major artery into Jerusalem from Samaria. One of the victims was hospitalized in serious condition, while a second was lightly wounded. PA officials confirmed the attacker was a member of the PA's security forces, although they did not specify his rank.

IDF Moves to Raze Terrorists' Homes Immediately After Attacks

The Israel Defense Forces has started mapping the houses of Palestinian terrorists within 24 hours of an attack, in a bid to speed up its controversial home-demolition policy. A senior defense official says that quickly implemented demolitions are the most effective, although he admits the process is "draconian." The IDF's latest home demolition took place in the early hours of Thursday morning, when it razed the Nablus home of Ragheb Ahmad Muhammad Aliwi, the Hamas cell commander behind the October 1 murder of Israelis Eitam and Na'ama Henkin.

Israel Arrests 'Jewish Terror Group' Over Arson Attack in WB

Israel's police and domestic intelligence agency, the Shin Bet, has arrested "several Israelis" in connection with an arson attack in July that killed three members of a Palestinian family, including a toddler. An announcement of arrests had been widely expected after media outlets this week reported a breakthrough in a case involving Jewish extremism. Investigators confirmed in a statement that members of a "Jewish terror group" had been arrested in connection with the attack. The statement did not disclose how many suspects were in custody and said a court order banning disclosure of their names and other details of the case remained in effect.

Ya'alon in Washington: Israel 'Very Worried' About Iran in Syria

Speaking at the U.S. Congress Wednesday, Defense Minister Moshe Ya'alon urged the US to stay wary of Iranian actions in Syria and across the region. "We are very worried about Iran's presence in Syria," Ya'alon said. "Iran's Quds Force is currently the only source actively working in Syria to attack us, trying to smuggle weapons and run messengers," he continued. In the past, a number of attacks across the Syrian border have been attributed to Hezbollah. Hezbollah remains firmly on Israel's radar, however. Ya'alon in particular highlighted chemical and "advanced" weapons transfers to groups such as Hezbollah as key threats to Israel's security.

PM: We Could Destroy Al Aqsa If We Wanted to, But We Don't

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has told his Likud faction that Israel could easily destroy the flashpoint Al-Aqsa Mosque in Jerusalem, but chooses not to as it contradicts Israeli values. "If we wanted to destroy Al-Aqsa, it would not require a great effort... but it goes against everything we stand for," the prime minister tells his party's MKs, in a recording played by Army Radio.

Israel Snubs Meeting Belgium FM Over EU Settlement Policy

Relations between Belgium and Israel are on ice following a decision by Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to refuse a meeting with Belgian Foreign Minister Didier Reynders, the Middle East Monitor reported Wednesday. Reynders was scheduled to arrive in Tel Aviv within the next week to engage in peace process talks. But Netanyahu said the decision to cancel the meeting was prompted by Brussels' plan to label all goods exported from Israeli settlements. The Belgian foreign ministry has decided to postpone Reynders' visit indefinitely, the Monitor reported.

IAEA Report: Iran Worked on Nuclear Weapons Development

The International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) yesterday published its long-awaited report into the possible military dimensions of Iran's nuclear development concluding a weapons program did exist until 2003, continuing sporadically until 2009. Iran always claimed its nuclear work was purely for peaceful purposes. The detailed report concluded "a range of activities relevant to the development of a nuclear explosive device were conducted in Iran prior to the end of 2003 as a coordinated effort, and some activities took place after 2003." The IAEA assessed that this work comprised mainly the acquisition of technical capability. However, it raised concerns over Iranian experiments with exploding bridgewire detonators that generate critical fissile mass for a nuclear weapon.

We Are All Fighting ISIL - The Outlaws of Islam

Jordan has taken on a huge burden in the war against ISIL, which targets innocent people everywhere.

By His Majesty, King Abdullah II

Events taking place in the Middle East today will shape the security and stability of Europe and the world for decades to come. This is why I call the war on terrorism a Third World War, by other means. It is also why it is imperative for all of us to be united in this existential war. This is not a war that should divide us, but a war that should unite us in shared interests, common principles and fundamental human values.

I have said before that we are fighting a war within Islam against the outlaws of Islam, the Khawarej. Yet, as we have painfully seen, these terrorists and outlaws threaten the entire world.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

They target all of us, innocent men and women regardless of race or faith. It is a war we all have to fight, and win, as a united global community. It is a war that knows no boundaries, no geography or demography.

One that is not limited to Syria and Iraq, but extends to Africa, Asia, with its flames reaching Europe and the rest of the world.

Jordan considers the United Kingdom a close and historic friend, and a key ally. The United Kingdom certainly appreciates that these criminals are as much a threat to its own population as they are to us and the rest of the world.

We have witnessed with shock and sadness the brutal murder of British hostages. We have seen many failed plots against the UK, and the campaign to lure youngsters from Britain and across Europe to commit the most atrocious crimes, everywhere.

And you have seen how they have also brutally murdered Muslims in Syria, Iraq and elsewhere. The horrific images of the burning of our brave young pilot, Moaz al-Kasasbeh, remain forever in the collective conscience of the civilised world today.

Both our countries are working side by side in fighting the Khawarej in Iraq, and we see the capabilities of your Royal Air Force and its determined pilots. But again, while we respect borders, terrorists do not recognise them. Therefore, we need to look at the bigger picture. It is not enough to focus just on Iraq because they also control large areas in Syria and are establishing footholds in other areas in Asia and Africa.

I do not believe our countries, or our world, can afford to wait much longer. While we pursue the political solution in Syria, we must work together on fighting them in that country, and everywhere. And this is what we have been doing.

We need to work with Syrian opposition forces, who are on the ground in Syria, to defeat the Khawarej, while working with equal determination on advancing the political process. The Syrian opposition, especially in the south, is both capable and willing to fight and they deserve our support.

Of course, military action is only part of the answer in delivering a secure future for all of us. We need to coordinate our efforts on a strategy that includes humanitarian support, as well as diplomatic and political progress.

Your Prime Minister, David Cameron, visited Jordan in September and saw the huge burden we are bearing, with a fifth of our population now Syrian refugees. We remain grateful for British aid in helping those refugees and the Jordanian communities that host them.

I draw hope from the ongoing talks in Vienna. A real opportunity now presents itself to bring together the global coalition that is required today on both the political and military levels.

It is up to all of us to face this moment of truth with determination. All of us in the fight against Daesh [known in Britain as Islamic State in Iraq and the Levant, or Isil] need to decide where we stand. On behalf of the international community Jordan has made its decision and taken on a burden far beyond its size.

We believe this is the right thing to do, to stand up for our values and do everything we can to protect our religion, our people, and our nation.

As you go through your internal debate on this major global threat, it is important to understand that your country's contribution to this undertaking, by carrying out air strikes against Daesh in Syria, can be crucial.

We ask you, our friends in the United Kingdom, Europe and the World, to stand together with us in meeting the challenge and eliminating this global threat.

His Majesty, King Abdullah II Ibn Al Hussein, is the 41st-generation direct descendant of the Prophet Mohammad. King Abdullah assumed his constitutional powers as monarch on 7 February 1999. Following the leadership legacy of his father, the late King Hussein, King Abdullah has made the welfare of Jordan's people the cornerstone of his policies for national development, regional peace and global coexistence.

A Vision for a Moderate, Modern Muslim World

Creating an ideology of openness, optimism, and opportunity in the Gulf is a key component to defeating extremism.

By Yousef Al Otaiba

In St. Petersburg and Sinai, Bamako and Beirut, Mosul and Paris, the world has been shocked by a murderous month of Islamic extremist violence. With a more sophisticated enemy and the return of radicalized fighters, the Middle East's terrorism challenge has become a global challenge in a way not seen since the 9/11 attacks.

The Islamic State must be defeated on the field of battle but also in the war of conflicting ideologies. As Muslims, we have the most at stake and must be leaders on both fronts.

In the United Arab Emirates (UAE), we are joined with the international community to bring new energy to the fight against the most destabilizing and dangerous force since fascism. For more than 12 years, from the air and on the ground, the UAE has been combating extremists in Afghanistan, Somalia, Syria, and Yemen. We continue to aggressively attack extremist support networks — blocking the flow of funds and foreign fighters, contesting extremists online, and devising new counterradicalization strategies.

But success on the battlefield may be the easy part. We know that to win, we must not only defeat what we are against, but we must also define what we as Muslims and Arabs are for. True victory can only come when the more powerful forces of tolerance and progress prevail over the twisted ideology of the Islamic State and its kind.

Is this even possible in the Middle East? One hundred years after the Sykes-Picot agreement, can the region overcome its history of sectarian and ethnic division? Is there a new model of and for the Middle East built on hope rather than hate?

In the UAE, we are trying to find out. We are testing a new vision for the region — an alternative, future-oriented ideology. It is a path guided by the true tenets of Islam: respect, inclusion, and peace. It empowers women, embraces diversity, encourages innovation, and welcomes global engagement.

With the world's attention focused on the aftermath of the Paris attacks, it went largely unnoticed that Amal Al Qubaisi was appointed president of the UAE's Federal National Council, making her the first woman in the region to lead a national assembly. An architect by profession, she was also the first woman to be a member of the council.

Just weeks earlier, a group of Emirati and expatriate religious, political, and diplomatic leaders celebrated the reopening of the restored St. Andrew's Church in Abu Dhabi. The Anglican church's chaplain, the Rev. Canon Andrew Thompson, has said , "In many ways it's easier being a Christian here than it is back in the United Kingdom."

Father Bishoy Salib of Abu Dhabi's Coptic Orthodox Church recently expressed a similar sentiment. "The UAE is an exemplary worldwide model of multi-religion gathering and cooperation. This is the peaceful environment where all regions can grow and meet each other."

In the same spirit of openness, the Emirati government announced this summer that it is donating the land for the country's third Hindu temple. These churches and temples — along with many other centers of worship — serve the nearly 8 million expatriates of virtually all faiths and nationalities who live and work together peacefully in the UAE.

Also little noticed was the Nov. 21 meeting in Cairo of the Muslim Council of Elders, which strongly condemned the Paris and Mali massacres. The council is an international body of forward-thinking scholars and experts that is giving greater voice to moderate Islam. Established and supported by Emirati leaders, the council is modernizing the way Islam is taught in schools, developing new training programs for imams, and updating Quranic commentaries.

Beyond encouraging religious diversity and tolerance, we are also seeding an ideology of optimism and opportunity. In Washington this week, the UAE will join with NASA in recognizing the UAE Space Agency and its ambitious plans to put a probe on Mars in 2021 — our country's 50th anniversary. For the UAE, this is the Arab world's version of President John F. Kennedy's moon shot — a galvanizing vision for the future that can engage and excite a new generation of Emirati and Arab youth.

Putting a probe on Mars is a vision for the future, but putting people to work is the challenge of today. In the UAE, we are building an economic engine for the entire region, a place where the free flow of goods, services, people, investment, and ideas lifts the entire Middle East and links it to Africa, Asia, Europe, and the Americas. It is a sustainable post-hydrocarbon economy — driven by innovation, human capital, rule of law, and open trade.

In the UAE, we believe it is possible to be Muslim, moderate, and modern at the same time. We are committed to promoting this ideology of openness, optimism, and opportunity across the region. Arab parents can and should believe that their children's future can be better than their own. We know it is a vision, but also a realistic and attainable one — no less difficult or less inspiring than launching a man to the moon or a mission to Mars.

His Excellency Yousef Al Otaiba, Ambassador of the United Arab Emirates to the United States of America, took up his Washington-based post in July 2008. In this role, Ambassador Al Otaiba enhanced UAE-US relations and improved bilateral security and economic cooperation. In addition to leading efforts that increased military, intelligence and counterterrorism cooperation between the two countries, he also played a critical role to facilitate the landmark US-UAE Agreement for Peaceful Civilian Nuclear Energy Cooperation (123 Agreement), which came into force in 2009.

The Clinton Foundation and #WorldElephantDay
As part of World Elephant Day yesterday, Clinton Foundation Vice Chair Chelsea Clinton authored an op-ed for AOL titled "To protect Africa's elephants, stop the demand." In the piece, which was featured on the AOL homepage, Chelsea writes about how a consortium of CGI members has committed to take action.

> It's clear that one of the simplest things we can do to stop the killing of elephants is to reduce consumer demand for ivory by stigmatizing its purchase. Thanks to the coordinated efforts of a consortium of Clinton Global Initiative members called the Elephants Action Network, we are working hard to do just that. Together, the partner organizations have pledged to coordinate their efforts across three pillars of action to: stop the killing of elephants, stop the trafficking of their tusks and stop the demand for their ivory.

The Alliance for a Healthier Generation, which was founded by the Clinton Foundation and the American Heart Association, empowers kids across America to develop lifelong, healthy habits. Because of its work, more than 29,000 American schools are providing kids with healthy food choices in an effort to eradicate childhood obesity. On Saturday, the Independent in Kentucky reported on how their community is helping support the Alliance and its goals by sending people to participate in the New York City Marathon.

John Podesta

Founder, Center for American Progress

Dear Mr Podesta,

I am writing to ask for a filmed interview for our four-hour TV history of US politics in the Obama years. The series will be broadcast early in 2016 on the BBC – and on partner broadcasters in America, Europe, Canada, Australia, Japan and the Middle East.

You probably have forgotten but we met long ago (in the first week of the Center for American Progress). You gave us an off-the-record briefing for our series ELUSIVE PEACE. We still remember a very funny story about President Clinton's bout of food poisoning after a delayed visit to Pakistan – or was it India?

What is unusual about our histories is that the story is told only by the decision-makers and their close advisors. No journalists or pundits tell the audience what to think. (To view some short excerpts, click on this link: Brook Lapping Documentaries .)

The London Times said of our most recent series, THE IRAQ WAR, for the BBC and the National Geographic Channel: "Television is rarely as gripping, informed and important as this."

Other series – such as IRAN AND THE WEST (2009) and PUTIN RUSSIA & THE WEST (2012) – have won top awards on both sides of the Atlantic, including five Peabody Awards, four duPonts, two British Academy Awards and a prime time Emmy. They are used to brief policy-makers and are part of university syllabuses. A note on our method and some reviews are attached.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Those we have interviewed for previous series include Bill Clinton (three times), Jimmy Carter, George H. W. Bush, Walter Mondale, Dick Cheney, Colin Powell, Condoleezza Rice, Madeleine Albright, Bill Burns, Mike McFaul, Jim Jones, as well as Tony Blair, Vladimir Putin, Jacques Chirac and Mikhail Gorbachev. That such people are willing to take part – and do so again, after they have seen the result – we hope speaks for itself.

For AMERICA IN THE OBAMA YEARS we have interviewed or are arranging interviews with (among others): Robert Gates, Valerie Jarrett, Kathleen Sebelius, Cecilia Munoz, Jason Furman, Phil Schiliro, Jack Lew, Samantha Power, William Daley, David Axelrod, Jim Messina, Larry Summers, Ben Rhodes, Peter Orszag, Mona Sutphen, Dick Durbin, Joe Lieberman, Chris Dodd, Bill Burns, Wendy Sherman and Jake Sullivan.

We would like to talk to you about your time with President Obama – especially how you successfully pushed forward the President's climate change agenda through executive action and the historic deal you reached with China, dealing with the ISIS crisis, the immigration executive order and the decision to start normalising US relations with Cuba.

This is a serious history that will reach millions worldwide. Without your participation we can't get it right. We hope you can spare us an hour.

Best wishes,

Catholics United Celebrates Selection of Dr. Miguel Diaz as U.S. Ambassador to the Holy See

Catholics United executive director Chris Korzen issued the following statement in response to the Obama Administration's nomination of Dr. Miguel Diaz as U.S. ambassador to the Holy See. When confirmed by the Senate, Dr. Diaz will be the first Latino to serve in this position.

"Catholics United is thrilled to learn that Dr. Miguel Diaz has been nominated as U.S. ambassador to the Holy See. Dr. Diaz is a devout Catholic, a respected theologian, a leader in the Catholic Latino community, and a dedicated husband and father of four children. We have full confidence that he will serve our nation well and we invite all Catholics to join us in celebrating this historic nomination."

"The Obama Administration and the Holy See share many common concerns, such as protecting the environment, fostering peace in the Middle East, disarming nuclear arsenals and cultivating international development, especially for the poorest nations of the world. Dr. Diaz's ability to work constructively for common ground makes him a superb choice for this position."

Subject: [big campaign] Tracking Update: McCain Town Hall in Pemberton, NJ 06/13/08

Hi Big Campaign,
Just off the phone with our tracker Greg who was on the ground in Pemberton, NJ today. Below are the notes from our call.

BIG HIGHLIGHTS:
* McCain calls Supreme Court's Gitmo ruling "one of the worst in history." Says it will flood the courts with habeas corpus appeals. Praises and quotes Roberts that this was a victory for the rule of lawyers, not the rule of law.
* Brings up social security again, reiterates the claim that he is not for "privatization," just private accounts
* Says 'I've traveled all around the world -- usually at your expense.'
* Takes question about 9/11, promises 'I will get Osama Bin Laden and bring him to justice.'
* Asked about how he'll open doors to women, praises Hillary and promises to help end discrimination and hand over a safer, more prosperous nation

PEMBERTON, NJ - McCain Town Hall Meeting 06/13/08

Background Details:
- Crowd noticeably more energized and supportive and larger
- 1,500 people in crowd, Fairly diverse
- Tracker had no trouble getting in
- A series of people gave introductory remarks: Burlington College Pres. gave intro, then NJ Congressman Dick Zimmer, Medford Mayor Chris Myers, Congressman Chris Smith, Congressman Jim Saxton, former Gov. Tom Kaine
- Lieberman introduced McCain, talked about bipartisanship, security
- Lindsey Graham was in audience. Cindy and Meghan did NOT appear to be in attendance, nor other top McCain staffers
- NJ Chairman of McCain's campaign was event moderator
- Post-event, while McCain was working the crowd, some people stood up with signs including one that read: "Bush's policies with a better vocabulary. Don't be fooled." Another sign read "We stand against imperialism." [on footage] Tracker didn't see protesters outside the event.

Speech Highlights:
- Thank yous.
- Veterans stand up and be recognized.
- We will take care of our veterans - it's a top priority.
- These town hall meetings are the most important part of the process. It gives me an opportunity to hear from you. It helps me enormously. I'll give you an example -- folks in 2000 asked me about climate change. I didn't know anything about it at the time, but I went back and now it's a major issue for me. It's great to hear from ordinary people.
- I've asked Obama to engage in these town hall meetings with me. Unfortunately, Senator Obama has not agreed. I've set aside one day a week.
- By the way, I've already accepted invitations to do town hall meetings at LBJ Library and the Reagan Library. I hope Obama accepts too.
- I think this campaign should be for you. You are tired of all the attack ads, etc.
- I respect Senator Obama - but we have stark differences.
- Obama believes in big goverment, big spending, raising taxes and government run healthcare. I'm not for those things.
- We are in two wars.
- Yesterday, the Supreme Court issued a decision -- that I think is one of the worst in history. My friends, there are some bad people down there. So now what are we going to do? We are now going to have the courts flooded. By the way 30 of the people who have been released from

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Guantanamo Bay have already tried to attack America. Our first obligation is to keep America safe.
- Chief Justice Roberts -- one of the most respected judges in history -- Obama opposed his nomination
Reads quote from Roberts' opinion: 'so who has one? not the detainees -- the court just leaves them with more litigation -- not the rule of law, unless that now means the rule of lawyers who will now replace military experts as the judges on these alien combatants'
- Senator Obama strongly supported this position
- There are 3 main challenges of this campaign: Reform, Prosperity and Peace.
REFORM
- We must change the way we do business in Washington. I know how to reach across the aisle and work with Democrats. We must fix the broken system -- and the out of control pork-barrel spending. I will fix it.
- I've never received pork for my state of Arizona. Obama has received millions in just his short time there.
- I will not privatize social security -- what I want is to let younger workers and only younger workers have a choice. It's their money, it's your money. We will make sure present day retirees have the money they need.
PROSPERITY
- Americans are hurting right now.
- I am convinced that if we do what Senator Obama wants to do -- and that is raise your taxes -- it will be bad for American families. I want to cut your taxes.
- I want keep corporate taxes low. We have the second highest corporate taxes in the world -- we're at 35%, Ireland is at 11%.
- We have to address the issue of health care in America. I want to give American families the choice of what they want.
- Gas - we all know that the price of foreign oil is sky-rocketing. And it's hitting fixed income Americans the worst. We must achieve a goal of energy independence. We have the ability to do it. And nuclear power has to be part of that. Let me remind you that the French have 80% of their electricity being made by nuclear.
- We will develop a concrete plan to make us independent of foreign oil.
- A lot of the money we spend on oil is ending up in the hands of terrorists.
- We can become independent of foreign oil in a shorter time than anyone predicts. I will lead that.
PEACE
- Struggle against radical-Islamic extremists is the transcendant battle of the 21st century.
- We can and we are winning.
- The central battleground is Iraq. When I got back from Iraq the first time, I criticized Rumsfeld's strategy.
- I supported the surge when no one else did. I'd much rather lose a political campaign than lose a war.
- Mosul, Baghdad, Basra are now under Iraqi control with U.S. support.

Question and Answer:

1 Q): Jeffery Winegard, Cliffton, NJ: In your first term, will you commit to subsidize renewable energy sources?
MCCAIN: I will support pure research and development. Once we develop that, I'd like to hand it off to private industry and businesses. The marketplace will make the solutions better. I went into Iowa and said I don't support ethanol subsidies because it distorts the market.
FOLLOW-UP: Thoughts on opening up the strategic petroleum reserve?
MCCAIN: I think you're talking about ANWR. The strategic petroleum reserve was designed for a day if we were completely cut off.

2 Q): How do you balance between concerns about the environment but also tapping into the coal, etc resources within the U.S.?
MCCAIN: I've traveled all around the world -- usually at your expense. (AUDIENCE- huh?)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I do believe greenhouse gases are effecting the environment -- but we need to look into these resources.

3 Q) Young man next to me is going back to Iraq. Tomorrow will be 50 years since I came to this country from Italy. It took many years to get my citizenship. More needs to be done for immigration. And more needs to be done for those suffering from PTSD that are coming back from Iraq.

MCCAIN: Half of NJ's national guard will be deployed overseas this summer.
On immigration, basically we must secure our borders first. We have to have a tamper-proof biometric visa. We gotta address the issue of the 12 million people who are already here.
Finally, on PTSD and the wounds of this conflict are very, very tough. I go out to Walter-Reed and these places. One of the problems with the VA system is the health care for folks. We need to make that better. People are standing and waiting in line. We need to give vets plastic cards so they can health care anywhere.

4 Q) Survivor and escapee from world trade center. Consider an event with me this coming Sept. 11. My young daughter wants to be the first woman president for "the red team." Please tell me how you're campaign will open doors for women.

MCCAIN: Clinton waged a tough and honorable campaign. I have to make sure that young people know that I will hand over to them a safe and prosperous nation. I will make sure there will be no discrimination.

5 Q) How will you provide citizens with disabilities opportunities?

MCCAIN: I played a part in the passage of the Americans with Disabilities Act - we need to update it.

Follow-up: Would you consider having a special position in your cabinet focusing on persons with disabilities issues?

MCCAIN: Yes I would consider that.

6 Q) Girl asked about education.

MCCAIN: New Orleans has great charter schools.I will spend more money, but it's got to be done wisely and efficiently. We need to change education in American based on the fundamental principles, we reward good teachers, we reward good schools and choice and completition.

7 Q) I brought my son here today to be in the presence of greatness. Navy veteran. My wife flew from Newark, NJ the day of 9/11, 5 months pregnant with his brother. When are we going to get Bin Laden?

MCCAIN: After 9/11, the Diamondbacks played the Yankees; McCain went to the game with Giuliani, where Rudy was praised by the people for doing such a great job.
One of the reasons we are safer today and there hasn't been an attack is because of the great work of NJ governor on the 9/11 commission.
We need a dramatic improvement in our intelligence. Our technological intelligence is good -- but we need more human intelligence. People who can go swim in the water. 'I will get Osama Bin Laden and bring him to justice.' I will do that.

Conclusion

I need your help I need your support. I will campaign here. We will win in November.

Subject: RE: Hillary Rodham Clinton

Dear Jake,
Thanks. It might be worthwhile to touch base on two issues with a short-term tail.

First is the deteriorating U.S.-Israel relationship, with the increasingly bitter Obama-Bibi tiff; his March 3 speech to Congress (both the improper process used, but also his likely message on more Iran sanctions); and the AIPAC conference where Bibi will speak the day before (and Hillary may also be speaking). Here a simple call from Hillary that it is important to stop the downward spiral of events with our close ally, notwithstanding mistakes, so we can focus on the key issues of Middle East peace and preventing Iran for acquiring a bomb would be a welcome positive, "adult" statement.

Second, we need to prepare for the likely announcement of a framework agreement toward the end of March between the U.S. and Iran. Hillary will have to make a statement. I would be glad to work with you on it. As I mentioned, I have chaired the Iran Task Force for the Atlantic Council for three years, and am in touch with the Administration.

Best wishes,

Stu

Stu -- apologies for my delayed reply, and thank you for your willingness to lend your talents and experience to the HRC mission. We are just now at the beginning stages of putting together the policy architecture for the campaign. I'd love to connect by phone in a couple of weeks after things are a bit clearer, so that we can talk about how to make this work well. Does that make sense?

Thanks, and all my best,
Jake

Dear Jake,

I hope you are well. I have talked with Melanne Verveer and Huma Abedin about helping in the potential presidential campaign. Most recently, I met with Tom Nides at the World Economic Forum in Davos to ask him the best way to plug-in to the policy side. He told me that you would be heading the policy and issues side of the campaign.

I have been privileged to work for all eight years of the Clinton Administration as U.S. Ambassador to the European Union; Under Secretary of Commerce for International Trade; Under Secretary of State for Economic, Business & Agricultural Issues; and as Deputy Secretary of the Treasury. During over six of those years, I also served as Special Adviser to the President and Secretary of State on Holocaust Issues, negotiating over $8 billion in recoveries in negotiations with the Swiss and French banks, German and Austrian corporations for slave and forced labor, European insurance companies for unpaid insurance policies, and with over 40 countries for the Washington Principles on Nazi-looted art, which has led to the restitution of thousands of stolen art works. In this work, I was strongly supported by both President Clinton and then-First Lady Hillary Rodham Clinton, who frequently asked to be briefed.

My relationship with her continued when she (as President Clinton had done) graciously agreed to speak to my Eizenstat Family Memorial Lecture series in Atlanta at the Ahavath Achim Synagogue, before over 2500 people. In her term as Secretary of State, she appointed me as her Special Adviser on Holocaust Issues, and in that capacity, I negotiated a $50 million agreement with Lithuania, and headed the U.S. delegation to the 2009 Prague Conference on Holocaust-Era Assets (which produced the Terezin Declaration) and the 2010 Prague Conference on Best Practices and Guidelines for the Restitution and Compensation of Real Property Confiscated by the Nazis and their allies from 1933-45.

My late wife Fran and Hillary worked at the Children's Defense Fund, and Hillary was especially kind to her over the years. When Fran passed away in 2013, she and President sent moving, handwritten notes of condolence, which I cherish to this day.

Because every word she utters is put into a campaign context, permit me to suggest areas in which I could be helpful, even now, before any formal campaign may be announced, and thereafter, if there is a formal announcement.

1. IRAN

As President Carter's Chief White House Domestic Policy Adviser, I helped shape the original hostage-related sanctions against Iran.

As Deputy Secretary of the Treasury in the Clinton Administration, I took the lead in imposing the first sanctions against Osama Ben Laden and al Qaeda. For the past three years I have chaired the Iran Task Force of the Atlantic Council (the first year as co-chair with Chuck Hagel, before he became Secretary of Defense) We have put out over a dozen published reports on all aspects of the Iranian situation, for the nuclear talks to their internal political and economic challenges, and have organized scores of conferences with leading experts. In this capacity, I have met with Iranian Foreign Minister Zarif in small, private meetings at their UN Mission in New York in 2013 and 2014, on the margins of the UN General Assembly and have reported the results to senior people in the Administration.

Our Task Force has been generally supportive of the Obama Administration's negotiations. Needless to say, if and when an agreement is reached on a nuclear deal, which I anticipate, this will become a political "hot potato". I can be helpful in shaping a response.

2. SANCTIONS AND GENERAL FOREIGN/DEFENSE POLICY

During the Clinton Administration, I was the "sanctions-meister", successfully negotiating sanctions issues with the European Union under the Iran-Libya Sanctions Act, the Helms-Burton Act, and the Religious Freedom Act. As I mentioned, I was involved in Iran sanctions issues from the Carter through the Clinton Administration, and now with the Atlantic Council.

But I have also become very knowledgeable in my private practice with the Ukraine-Russia related sanctions.

I am on the Defense Policy Board (appointed by Secretary of Defense Hagel), and we have focused on issues like Russia/Ukraine, ISIS, Iraq, and Syria.

3. INTERNATIONAL TRADE

I was involved as President Carter's Domestic Policy Adviser and Director of the White House Domestic Policy Staff, with the completion of the Tokyo Round of the WTO in 1977, led by Special Trade Represented Bob Strauss, and then the Uruguay Round in 1994, as U.S. Ambassador to the European Union, led by Special Trade Representative Mickey Kantor. I also served under Mickey as his Under Secretary of Commerce for International Trade, where I traveled around the world promoting American trade and investment, and then as Under Secretary of State, working on many of the same issues, but from a broader diplomatic perspective. I was involved in the China MFN issue.

As U.S. Ambassador to the European Union, I created, along with then Commerce Secretary Ron Brown, the Transatlantic Business Dialogue (TABD), which remains the officially recognized business voice on transatlantic trade issues by both the U.S. government and the European Union. To this day, I am the American chair of the Transatlantic Business Council (TABC), of which TABD is a part.

I chair the international trade and finance practice at Covington & Burling, LLP, and was selected recently as Trade Lawyer of the Year by the American Lawyer magazine. I have testified several times on international trade issues, particularly the Transatlantic Trade and Investment Partnership (TTIP). President Obama's Trade Representative Mike Froman and I meet frequently, most recently at the TABD/TABC meeting in Davos. He asked me to provide advice on the regulatory reform part of TTIP, along with a few other trade experts.

The Transpacific Partnership (TPP) will come before TTIP, as will Trade Promotion Authority (fast-track). All of these to one degree or the other will be opposed by labor and consumer groups. I believe I can help you shape

4. EUROPEAN UNION

Having been U.S. Ambassador to the European Union (1993-96), negotiating with them frequently during the Clinton Administration, co-chairing the TABC, and writing articles on the EU (e.g. with our current U.S. Ambassador to the EU Tony Gardner in the 2010 Foreign Affairs Magazine), I believe I understand the EU as well as almost anyone. The EU is an increasingly important economic and political partner (e.g. Iran and Russian sanctions). I am well known in Brussels and can be helpful as an informal emissary there.

5. CLIMATE CHANGE

I was the head of the U.S. delegation, as Under Secretary of State, to the Kyoto Protocol negotiations, and played a central role in its negotiations, including aligning the positions of the EU, Japan, and other major industrial democracies with that of the U.S. I worked closely with then Vice President Gore and senior people in the White House, including Gene Sperling. I have continued to stay engaged in climate change issues. With the December 2015 Paris Climate Change Conference coming up, this issue will receive a great deal of visibility going into the 2016 election year.

6. ISRAEL, MIDDLE EAST PEACE PROCESS, JEWISH ISSUES

During the 2008 campaign, I served as a frequent surrogate speaker for the Hillary Clinton campaign on Israel and Jewish issues.

As Under Secretary of State and Deputy Secretary of the Treasury, I was responsible for dealing with the economic aspects of the peace process, while Dennis Ross led the political side. I negotiated some half dozen times with Yasir Arafat, worked on the QIZs in Gaza and Jordan (which I visited), the airport in Gaza, getting Palestinian workers and VIP Palestinian business leaders into Israel, and on other economic initiatives. Of course, this was done in close coordination with senior Israeli officials. As Under Secretary of State, I also negotiated with then Finance Minister Jacob Neeman, the phase-out of the economic assistance program for Israel, in return for increased levels of military assistance.

I also headed the U.S. government side of the joint U.S.-Israel Economic Dialogue during the Clinton Administration.

As a result of co-chairing with Dennis Ross, the Jewish People's Policy Institute of Jerusalem, a think tank created by the Jewish Agency and supported by major UJA Federation heads and major Jewish donors, Dennis and I meet for up to two hours annually with Prime Minister Netanyahu and his Cabinet to present our Assessment of the State of the Jewish People, for which Dennis and I do the Introduction. I have worked with the Prime Minister since his years as Finance Minister, and we have maintained a close relationship, despite our contrary views on settlements. I know most of the major figures in the Israeli political firmament. I travel to Israel two to three times a year, and have a vast array of friends and relatives there. Both my grandfather and great-grandfather are buried in the Petach Tikva cemetery.

For the past several decades, I participate in a small, off-the-record breakfast group, with the Israeli Ambassadors to the U.S., all of whom I know personally, most recently with Ron Dermer. Fran and I were so close to Ron and his family, that we went to his bar mitzvah in Miami, and remain a frequent guest at private events at his home. I have a close relationship with Howard Kohr of AIPAC, but at the same time, I am respected by the J Street group. Indeed, before he created J Street, Jeremy Ben-Ami came to seek my advice, and I urged then Ambassador Michael Oren to end the Israeli Embassy boycott of J Street, which they did, up to a point.

I could serve as a formal or informal emissary to Israeli government officials. I could also help with drafting and/or reviewing speeches on the Middle East peace process. I also know Palestinian officials. At Davos, for example, I participated in an off-the-record session "Breaking the Impasse" with the deputy prime minister and finance minister of the Palestinian Authority, and leading Palestinian and Israeli business people. I proposed to him the creation of QIZs in the West Bank, for example. Remarkably, while there was one in Gaza, that was very successful before the second intifada, and over a dozen in Jordan, there are none in the West Bank.

I have a great deal of visibility in the American and world Jewish community due to my ongoing Holocaust work; my co-chairmanship with Dennis of JPPI; two books ("Imperfect Justice; Looted Assets, Slave Labor and the Unfinished Business of World War II" on my Holocaust negotiations, in 2003 an later translated into four languages; and in 2012 and a new version in 2014, "The Future of the Jews: How Global Forces are Impacting on the Jewish People, Israel, and its Relationship with the United States"); frequent articles in Jewish publications, and speeches to Jewish audiences in the U.S. and around the world, from college campuses to federations to the General Assembly of the Jewish Agency to the upcoming AIPAC conference; my ongoing Holocaust negotiations; and my chairmanship of the Defiant Requiem Foundation, which has sponsored a concert-drama around the world (Kennedy Center, Lincoln Center, Jerusalem, Berlin, Prague, Budapest, etc.) called "Defiant Requiem: Verdi at Terezin", which honors a Jewish prisoner chorus at Theresenstadt concentration camp and the documentary "Defiant Requiem", which likewise honors the broader courageous artistic and musical performances at Theresenstadt. Our documentary was nominated for two Emmy awards in 2014 (best full-length documentary and best script), has been shown on PBS on Yom Hashoah day in 2013, and has been purchased by Netflix and BBC.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I continue to serve as Special Adviser on Holocaust Issues to Secretary of State Kerry, as I did for then-Secretary of State Clinton. On December 8, 2014, I signed in the State Department's Treaty Room a $60 million agreement with the French government for those current non-French citizens in the U.S., Israel, and around the world, who were involved in the deportations from France to the death camps, their spouses, and heirs. It was a widely-heralded breakthrough 70 years after the end of World War II. I am also working on the Gurlitt looted art case in Munich, and have met with the German Minister of Culture on this matter, with signficant results.

In my private capacity, since 2009, I have headed the negotiating team of the Jewish Claims Conference in their annual negotiations with the German Finance Ministry. Since 1952, the Claims Conference the official body for negotiations with the German government on behalf of Holocaust survivors. During that time, I have negotiated over $1.5 billion in benefits, including a landmark 2013 agreement for $1 billion in home care through 2017.

7. BUSINESS COMMUNITY

As a result of my corporate boards (UPS, BlackRock Funds, Alcatel-Lucent, Globe Specialty Metals), advisory boards (Christie's, GML Holdings, and formerly chair of the Coca-Cola International Advisory Board), co-chairmanship of the Transatlantic Business Council (with some sixty U.S. and European companies), and joint projects with the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, I could help the campaign as a liaison/spokesman with the U.S. business community.

8. GENERAL POLITICAL AND POLICY ADVICE

I have been involved in senior capacities in presidential campaigns since the 1968 Hubert Humphrey campaign, for which I served as his research director, and the 1976 Jimmy Carter campaign, for which I was policy director. I have helped with policy issues in the Dukakis campaign, and Bill Clinton's campaign. I have a keen sense of the combination of policy and political factors.

Due to my work in the Carter and Johnson White Houses (my first job after Harvard Law School in 1967-68), and as Deputy Treasury Secretary, I am knowledgeable on a wide range of domestic issues, including job training (I recently co-authored an article on an apprenticeship program for the U.S., modeled on the German and Swiss models) health care, tax policy, as well as international economic policy.

I am sorry to have gone on so long, but wanted to give you the fullest menu from which you can feel free to enlist my assistance. I practice law full-time, and serve on four corporate boards, as well as chairing the Defiant Requiem Foundation and co-chairing JPPI and TABC. But, I am prepared to give you considerable time. I am also prepared to contribute a substantial amount financially, and to help raise more, although I know this is not your jurisdiction.

Thanks for your consideration, and good luck on your important work,

Best wishes,

On college:

- We can't allow student debt to be dragging our young people down, when education is supposed to life them up. Here in Iowa, an average student will graduate from a 4-year college or university with nearly $30,000 in debt -- the 9th highest debt burden in the country. Shady for-profit colleges and abusive debt servicers are getting rich while students, families, and taxpayers get taken for a ride. I will propose ideas to fix these problems.

On voting rights:

Modernizing the voter registration system could add up to 50 million unregistered citizens to the rolls, cheaply, conveniently, and accurately.

On security

We need to protect America and Americans from the dangers we face, and assert confident American leadership to shape global events rather than be shaped by them.

POLICY

- We need to be strong and smart in dealing with new security challenges, like cyber, pandemics like Ebola, and emerging terrorist threats. We need to be strong and smart in dealing with the old geopolitical games that countries like Russia and China will play. And we need to be strong and smart in seizing opportunities to advance democracy, human rights and human dignity everywhere we can.

[could stop there or could add ...]

- We are in a long-term struggle against terrorism and violent extremism, and we need to be strong, disciplined, and smart to defeat the enemy. Let's lead the world in a comprehensive approach to restoring stability in the Middle East by confronting ISIS, checking Iranian aggression, dealing with the terrible humanitarian toll in Syria, and defending Israel at all costs.

- We are dealing with a canny operator in Vladimir Putin. Let's position ourselves and our allies for success by strengthening NATO, breaking Europe's dependence on Russian oil, and supporting a strong, united democratic Ukraine.

- We need to shape China's rise and make sure China plays by the rules. Let's cooperate with them where it is in our interest, and otherwise we should out-compete them and everyone else.

Anchor THE ESSENTIAL EIGHT

1. Officials: Second hack exposed military and intel data-AP "This tells the Chinese the identities of almost everybody who has got a United States security clearance," said Joel Brenner, a former top U.S. counterintelligence official. "That makes it very hard for any of those people to function as an intelligence officer. The database also tells the Chinese an enormous amount of information about almost everyone with a security clearance. That's a gold mine. It helps you approach and recruit spies."..Nearly all of the millions of security clearance holders, including some CIA, National Security Agency and military special operations personnel, are potentially exposed in the security clearance breach, the officials said...The newer estimate puts the number of compromised records between 9 million and 14 million going back to the 1980s, said one congressional official and one former U.S. official, who spoke to The Associated Press on condition of anonymity // /sounds devastating...how do you say jackpot in Chinese?

Related: White House Weighs Sanctions After Second Breach of a Computer System – NYTimes At the White House, officials said that Mr. Obama was weighing the use of an executive order he signed in April that allows the Treasury secretary to impose sanctions on individuals or groups that engage in malicious cyberattacks, or people who benefit from them. "This newly available option is one that is on the table," said Josh Earnest, the White House press secretary. // If the White House calls this a cyber attack and not cyber espionage doesn't that undermine its arguments that the US engages in "legitimate" cyber espionage? If China is behind this, how is this not "legitimate" cyber espionage according to way the US has defined it?

2. Zhou Yongkang, Ex-Security Chief in China, Gets Life Sentence for Graft – NYTimes "This is the point of decision, when he decides whether Zhou Yongkang is the last or the first great tiger," Roderick MacFarquhar, a professor at Harvard University who focuses on Chinese elite politics, said of Mr. Xi. "I think it's too early to tell." // This looks to be a clear win for Xi Jinping. There was no need to execute Zhou Yongkang as he is already politically dead, his network has known for a while resistance is futile and killing him would likely be politically difficult when capital is needed for other battles. Remember though that Xi had to have had consensus to launch the takedown of Zhou and his network; Li Chuncheng was detained three weeks after Xi became General Secretary and it is highly unlikely Xi had enough power so early his tenure to go after such a senior Zhou crony on his own. It may also be worth noting the relative speed of the Zhou takedown, less than 11 months from announcement of investigation to sentencing, far shorter than the processes for Politburo members Chen Xitong, Chen Liangyu and Bo Xilai. Has the corruption crackdown climaxed? I would not bet on it, though there are not many people left at Zhou's rank or above the CPC newspaper, applauded Zhou's trial and conviction in its editorial [_____]. "There are no privileged members in front of CPC discipline. There is no privileged citizen in front of the law," the editorial read. "No matter how much power one holds or how high one's position, one will surely be severely punished for violating Party discipline and state laws."..."The handling of my case in accordance with Party rules and the law reflects the authorities' determination to govern the Party strictly and advance the rule of law," Zhou added. // In his script Zhou mentioned two of the four comprehensives.. the Xinhua release in Chinese-_____

Related: China Security Head's Secret Trial Shows Limits of Xi's Push – Bloomberg More awkward moments could've unfolded if Zhou's trial was public, said Zhang, the Beijing-based historian. Xi couldn't afford having Zhou drag in more senior officials, further undermining the party after an anti-corruption campaign that has struck the upper echelons of power. "Here's a strong indication that Xi's big-tiger hunting campaign is drawing to a close," Zhang said. // Maybe I am missing something but I do not understand the guesses that holding a secret trial means that the tiger hunt is winding down...there are other reasons for making it secret, need much more evidence I think before concluding that this has climaxed. I continue to believe the opposite.

3. Top China General Tells U.S. Sea Dispute Shouldn't Hinder Ties – Bloomberg General Fan Changlong — second only to Chinese President Xi Jinping on the Central Military Commission — said during a visit to the Pentagon on Thursday that the territorial spat represented "just one episode in Sino-U.S. relations," according to a statement posted on the Ministry of National Defense website. The meeting between the defense chiefs helps pave the way for Xi's planned state visit in September.

As Fan Changlong, vice chairman of China's Central Military Commission, has said, the two nations "should take the higher ground to look into the far future by paying more attention to other, more important regional and international issues."

Related: China to work with U.S. to ensure success of President Xi's state visit: general – Xinhua In a meeting with U.S. National Security Advisor Susan Rice at the White House on Friday, Fan Chonglong, vice chairman of China's Central Military Commission, said both China and the United States attach great importance to Xi's visit, which he called the most important event in the development of the China-U.S. ties this year. The general, who is satisfied with the generally steady dev elopment of the bilateral ties, pledged that China will make joint efforts with the U.S. to create "a positive atmosphere" so as to ensure Xi's visit a great success. He commended the progress made in varied areas of the China-U.S. military ties, while proposing the two sides actively seek to build up a new type of military relationship based on "mutual trust, cooperation, non-conflict and sustainability" through increasing exchanges, conducting pragmatic cooperation and managing risks as well as crises.

Related: Defense.gov: Carter, Chinese Official Discuss Military Relationship Carter is pleased that Fan and Gen. Ray Odierno, Army chief of staff, will witness the signing the U.S.-China Army-to-Army Dialogue Mechanism framework document tomorrow, the statement said. This framework will open a new channel for leaders in the two armies to raise and discuss issues of mutual concern, such as humanitarian assistance and disaster response practices, they added. The two sides have agreed to renew efforts to account for missing U.S. military personnel in China, the statement said, noting that a 2008 agreement to search for information relating to U.S. military personnel missing in action before, during and after the Korean War will now be expanded to include personnel from the World War II, the Cold War, the Korean War and the Vietnam War.// and the US has scored an invite to China's September 3 parade to commemorate the end of the war, wonder who it will send

Related: America's contribution, sacrifice in China's anti-fascism war remembered – Xinhua Vice Chairman of China's Central Military Commission Fan Changlong (R, center) meets with 91-year-old Flying Tiger's veteran J.V. Vinyard, grand-daughter of General Chennault Nell Calloway, the son and daughter of Captain Paul C. Domke John B. Domke and Paula D. Sterling, in Washington D.C., the United States, June 12, 2015. China always remembers the contribution and sacrifice made to it by the United States and the American people during the World War II, said Fan Changlong here Friday

4. In a fundamental shift, China and the US are now engaged in all-out competition | South China Morning Post-David Shambaugh OpEd Strangely Shambaugh makes no mention of what happens to the relationship when, as he recently predicted, the Party collapses. // This has given impetus to an unprecedented outpouring of commentary and reports by Washington think tanks in recent months. I have lived and worked there a long time, and cannot recall such a tsunami of publications on US-China relations – and they are all, with one exception (Kev in Rudd's Asia Society report), negative in nature, calling for a re-evaluation of US policy towards China, as well as a hardening of policy towards China across the board. A qualitative shift in American thinking about China is occurring. In essence, the "engagement" strategy pursued since Nixon across eight administrations, that was premised on three pillars, is unravelling ...This disillusion with China in America probably says much more about America than it does about China...Thus, these two great nations are likely to find it increasingly difficult to coexist – yet they must. However fraught, this is a marriage in which divorce is not an option. Divorce means war. // And expect the DC commentariat echo chamber to get much louder and more negative between now and the 2016 Presidential election...perhaps Xi and his advisers are picking up on what does seem to be a real shift back in DC, perhaps that partially explains some of the nice noises from the Fan trip...I do not agree with the conclusion that "divorce means war". For all the bluster I still believe Beijing does not believe that a conflict with the US has any benefits for the Party, the country or the individuals running it.

Related: Can China Be Contained? – WSJ –Andrew Browne in a similar vein. This is clearly now a serious issue in the relationship// The mood shift in Washington may end up being every bit as consequential as the one that came over the U.S. immediately after World War II, when it dawned on America that the Soviet Union wasn't going to continue to be an ally. That is when the legendary U.S. diplomat and policy thinker George F. Kennan formulated his plan for containment...try ing to contain China would be immensely costly: Neither country can succeed economically without the other. Kennan's containment strategy worked against the Soviet Union because it was economically weak, with almost no commercial ties to America. But today's China is an economic powerhouse, and its double-digit military budgets are supported by a deep and div ersified industrial base.

5. Chinese Hackers Circumvent Popular Web Privacy Tools – NYTimes As long as visitors to those websites were also logged into one of 15 Chinese Internet portals — including those run by Baidu, Alibaba and RenRen — the hackers were able to steal names, addresses, sex, birth dates, email addresses, phone numbers and even the so-called Internet cookies that track other websites viewed by a user. To get around the Tor and VPN technology , the attackers relied on a server software vulnerability that China's top companies apparently didn't patch, Mr. Blasco said.// how embarrassing for the firms whose services were used in this effort. Either they have really bad security practices or they were complicit? Given that several of them are getting more active in the US, amidst the deterioration in US-China relations, should we be surprised if US regulators start paying more attention to their US efforts?

6. China's Hot Stock Market Beckons Chinese Firms Home – WSJ the delisting/relisting should take a least a year for these firms, they better hope the Chinese market stays hot, though for the most part the Chinese tech firms listed in the US are of far better quality than the crappy ones on Chinext...Good for the investors and funders; they made a mint listing in the US and now they have a shot at making another mint by selling the same thing twice, this time to Chinese punters // "The primary motivation is the valuation gap between the U.S. market and the A-share market," said Bao Fan, founder of China Renaissance, China's top boutique-investment bank focused on technology companies. "Historically, Chinese capital markets weren't sophisticated enough to evaluate and invest in these companies," he said. "That's changed."
